

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. PREFACE.

THE Council has to apologise to the Members of the Society for the delay in the completion of this volume, occasioned by the very thorough and careful manner in which the important paper, Fountains Abbey, has been prepared by Mr. W. H. St. John Hope. It is hoped that the contents of the volume are not inferior in interest to those of its predecessors. Mr. Mill Stephenson has printed an account of the Monumental Brasses in the West Riding, leaving only those of the North Riding to be dealt with. To our treasurer, Mr. Matthew H. Peacock, and Professor Skeat the Society is indebted for a couple of valuable philological articles. In his article on the so-called Towneley Plays, Mr. Peacock very ingeniously proves that they were really composed and acted at Wakefield. Mr. Robert H. Skaife has again laid under contribution his stores of extracts from the Wills and Parish Registers at York. It is hoped that Mr. Chadwick's paper on the Stained Glass at Dewsbury, will be followed by others on the glass of the churches in the city of York, where there is so much that is especially worthy of record.

Two articles call for special notice as being of more than local interest:—Dr. Wickham Legg, in his paper on the Episcopal Ornament called the Pall, has in a most careful and erudite manner traced the history of its use from the earliest times. Mr. Micklethwaite's account of the Cistercian Order makes the reader hope that it will not be long before the article will be completed.

Mr. W. H. St. John Hope's article on Fountains Abbey, which must be taken in conjunction with Mr. Micklethwaite's paper, is intended as a guide to Houses of the Cistercian Order wherever situate. The Society has not spared expense, nor Mr. Hope pains, that the description and illustrations should be worthy of this noble monastic ruin. The coloured plan is a monument of the labour Mr. Hope has expended on this subject.

The Council has to say, in conclusion, that the authors of the various papers are alone responsible for the opinions and statements therein.

MONUMENTAL BRASSES IN THE

By MILL STEPHENSON, B.A., F.S.A.

IN the Journal (Vol. XI. pp. 71-93), Dr. F. R. Fairbank, F.S.A., has already treated of several of the brasses in this Riding, in his paper on "Ancient Memorial Brasses remaining in the Old Deanery of Doncaster." The following are fully described and illustrated, Burgh Wallis, Marr, Owston, Rawmarsh, Rotherham, Sprotborough, and Todwick. In this paper these are simply referred to, together with, in some cases, further notes as to where the brasses may be found illustrated.

Including those already described by Dr. Fairbank, there are in this division of the county nineteen brasses with effigies, viz.:

- 1 Ecclesiastic.
- 7 Armed figures with ladies.
- 2 Armed figures alone.
- 5 Civilians with ladies.
- 3 Civilians alone.
- 1 Lady alone.

To these may be added the "chalice" brasses at Leeds and Ripley; two curious plates, one at Leeds, the other at Otley; the fragments of brasses at Cowthorpe, Halifax, and Sandal Parva; and the original pieces at Skipton. The loss during comparatively recent years of almost the whole of the fine and curious brass at Cowthorpe is much to be deplored, as is also the injudicious restoration of the one at Bolton-by-Bowland. At Skipton-in-Craven certain of the brasses have been entirely renewed, but into one has been incorporated two fragments of the original, found under curious circumstances. Losses during recent years have also occurred at Halifax and Sandal Parva. On the other hand, several brasses have been found during restorations. Only one figure of an ecclesiastic remains, and this is in very poor condition. Two "palimpsests" have recently come to light, one at Ilkley and one at Rotherham. The former is but a fragment, the latter is very curious, as an old shield has been made to do duty for a complete memorial. At Cowthorpe there was a fine double canopy, but this is now gone. At Skipton, amongst the recovered fragments, is a curious and very late representation of the Trinity, the only one remaining in the county. Of rebuilders or restorers of churches or parts of churches there are five instances, Bolton-by-Bowland, Conisborough, Cowthorpe, Leeds, and Sandal Parva. The work of the local schools of engravers is very marked, especially in the seventeenth century, when makers' names appear at Bradfield, 1647, and Norman-ton, 1668. Of the earlier school there are good examples in the fifteenth century at Allerton Mauleverer, Kirkby Wharfe, Leeds, and Sprotborough; in the sixteenth at Burgh Wallis, Kirkheaton, Laughton-en-le-Morthen, St. John, and Wentworth. The late seventeenth century inscriptions are almost all the work of local engravers. A considerable number are noted in this paper, but the inscriptions are not printed in full. A few indents or casements of lost brasses are also noticed, e.g. the curious casements at Fountains Abbey, Roche Abbey, and Salley Abbey.

For the loan of rubbings, and for much information, the writer is indebted to the late Mr. G. W. Tomlinson, F.S.A., Dr. Fairbank, F.S.A., Mr. W. J. Kaye, F.S.A., the Rev. J. Harvey Bloom, and many others, to each of whom he desires to express his sincere thanks.

ADLINGFLEET.

Inscription only. Black letter. Mural. South aisle.

Christopher Egmonton, last heir of that name, 1587.

SIR JOHN MAULEVERERE, 1400, AND WIFE ELIANOR.

A curious and early instance of a quadrangular plate, partly cross-hatched and coarsely engraved. The figures in constrained attitudes and badly proportioned.

Sir John inclines slightly to the left, and is clad in a mixed armour of mail and plate. To the pointed bascinet is attached a moveable vizor, much resembling in shape the beak of a bird. Examples of this form of vizor are common in the illuminated manuscripts of this period, but rarely occur on brasses or monuments. Two of the small figures on the fine brass of Sir Hugh Hastings, 1347, at Elsing, Norfolk, have similar visors. The remaining portions of Sir John's armour call for no special comment. The jupon is emblazoned with the arms of Mauleverer (gu.), three levriers, or greyhounds, courant in pale (arg.), collared and belled (or). Another greyhound is represented curled up at his feet.

His wife Elianor wears the reticulated head-dress, a close-fitting kirtle fastened round the waist by an ornamented girdle, and over all a long flowing mantle. At her feet is a curious specimen of a dog.

Below the figures is a three-line black letter inscription :

Hic iacent dn's Johes Mauleverere miles & Elianora consors eius filia dn'i Petri de Midelton' militis qui Johes obiit xxx° die Noue'bris A° dn'i M°CCCC° quor' ai'ab; p'piciet' d's Amen.

The plate bearing the effigies measures 19 by 8 inches, and the inscription plate 24 by 3½ inches. Two shields, one on each side of the plate, lost. The brass lies on the floor of the North Chapel, and is engraved in the Archæological Journal, Vol. v. p. 68; Anastatic Drawing Society, Vol. for 1859; W. Smith's Old Yorkshire, Vol. for 1883, p. 165.

Sir John Mauleverer was son of Sir Halnath Mauleverer, and one of the deponents in the famous controversy between Scrope and Grosvenor in the court of chivalry 1385-90. It appears from his deposition that he was born in 1342, and had twice served in the Scotch wars. His wife Elianor was a daughter of Sir Peter Midelton, of Stockeld, in the parish of Spofforth. He was succeeded by his son Sir Halnath, who married Milicent, daughter and heiress of Sir Alexander Lutterell, and was Sheriff of Yorkshire in 1420-21.

In line three, the letters enclosed in brackets have been cut out.

Anne, only daughter and heiress of Edward Cresacre, of Barmborough, married, in 1529, John More, only son of Sir Thomas More, Chancellor of England. John More died in 1547, and in 1559 his widow married George, a nephew of Sir William West. On the death of her second husband in June, 1572, she conveyed her property to her son Thomas More. She herself died in 1577.

BATLEY.

Inscription only. Size of plate $40\frac{1}{2}$ by $18\frac{1}{2}$ inches. North chantry

A long inscription in Roman capitals, with four Latin and twelve English verses, to John, Lord Savile of Howley, 1630, æt. 74. His daughter and executrix Anne, widow of Percy Leigh, Esq., caused the monument to be erected "according to his (i.e. Lord Savile's) owne direction and appoyntment." The inscription is printed in full in Whitaker's Leeds, Vol. II. p. 235, but the English verses are worth quoting as an example of the fulsome epitaphs of this period:

HERE LIES INTOMB'D A PEERE OF GREAT RENOWNE
A SPIRIT NONE BYT DEATH COULD ERE BRINGE DOWNE
THE TITLE SHOWES HIS NAME, HIS NAME HIS GLORY

Inscription and shield.

Christopher Fetherstone, M.A., rector, 1653, with four Latin and six English verses.

Arms: a chevron between three ostrich feathers . . . , the chevron charged with an annulet for difference.

II.

Inscription only. Size of plate $4\frac{1}{4}$ by $8\frac{1}{4}$ inches.

Anne, wife of Stephen Husband, gent., 1683.

III.

Inscription only. Size of plate $12\frac{1}{2}$ by $9\frac{1}{2}$ inches.

Thomas Lupton, rector for fifty-six years, $17\frac{1}{2}$, æt. 81; and wife Mary, 1696, æt. 56.

BIRSTALL.

I.

ELIZABETH, WIFE OF FRANCIS POPELEY, 1632.

A quadrangular plate, measuring 20 by $12\frac{1}{2}$ inches, bearing the shrouded figure of Elizabeth Popeley stretched on a mattress, a pillow beneath the head. The shroud is open to show the face and breasts, but is gathered into a knot above the head. The hands are folded across the body. At the head of the recumbent figure is the effigy of her eldest daughter kneeling on a cushion, her hands joined in prayer. She wears a cap and a gown with large turned back collar and lace cuffs. At the feet of the figure is the smaller effigy of the younger daughter, also kneeling, but with one hand pointing to the body of her mother, and holding in the other a handkerchief. Below is an inscription in Roman capitals:

HIC IACET IN SPE RESVRRECTIONIS ELIZABETHA
VXOR FRANCISCI POPELEY GENEROSI $\frac{x}{2}$
MVLIER SINGVLARI VIRTUTE $\frac{x}{2}$ DVAS RELI-

OBIIT TRICESIMO DIE MENSIS DECEMBRIS

ANNO 1632

This brass is let into the wall at the south-west corner of the church.

II.

Inscription only. Size of plate $20\frac{1}{2}$ by 15 inches.

John Green, junior, late of Liversedghall, 1674, aged "thirtie-three yeares, three months, besid's nine dayes." Inscription in eighteen lines.

BOLTON-BY-BOWLAND.

HENRY PUDSEY, ESQ., 1509, AND WIFE MARGARET.

This pretty and interesting brass has unfortunately undergone an injudicious restoration. It has been relaid in a new slate slab, although the old slab still remains in the wall of the chantry. A new shield has been added, and on the top of this shield is placed a nineteenth century crest. The scrolls and the motto are also restorations, and all the incised lines have been filled in with composition.

Henry Pudsey is represented kneeling on a small tasselled cushion, bareheaded and with bare hands, in armour, with a tabard charged with the arms of LAYTON Arg., a fess between six crosses crosslet fitchy sa., quartering PUDSEY Vert, a chevron between three mullets or, pierced of the field. From his mouth proceeds a scroll, bearing:

miserere mei deus.

His wife Margaret, also represented kneeling, wears the kennel-shaped head-dress, a close-fitting gown with fur cuffs, and confined round the waist by an ornamented girdle fastened in front by three rosettes. Over all is a mantle, charged on the sinister side (the only side shown on account of the position of the figure) with the arms of CONYERS Az., a maunch or, charged in the lower part with a rose . . . for difference. From her mouth proceeds a scroll, bearing:

MAUNCH FROM
ON LADY'S MANTLE.

Below the figures is a black letter inscription in three lines:

Hic iacet Henricus Pudsey armiger dn's de Bolton qui construxerat hanc cantariam et obiit A° dn'i M° VC ix° et Margareta ux' ei' que obiit A° dn'i M° VC quor' ai'abz p'piciet' de'

The figures measure 12 inches in height, and the inscription plate 19 by 3½ inches. The brass is on the north wall of the Pudsey chantry.

Henry Pudsey, the builder of this chantry, married Margaret, a daughter of Sir John Conyers, of Hornby, by whom he had a numerous family. She died in 1500. The brass is engraved in Whitaker's Craven, 1st ed. p. 106 (unrestored); 3rd ed. by Morant, p. 125 (unrestored) and p. 134 (restored); Anastatic Drawing Society, vol. for 1876 (restored); Smith's Old Yorkshire, vol. for 1881, p. 65 (restored).

BRADFIELD, NEAR SHEFFIELD.

I.

JOHN MOREWOOD AND WIFE GRACE, 1647.

Quadrangular plate measuring $18\frac{1}{2}$ by $17\frac{1}{2}$ inches. Mural. Chancel.

The figures are represented kneeling on cushions at a prayer-desk, on which lie open books. John Morewood is represented with beard and moustache, and wears a skull cap, ruff, doublet, trunk hose, and gown. Behind him are the kneeling figures of his nine sons, wearing doublets with large collars, trunk hose, and gowns.

His wife Grace wears a high-crowned, broad-brimmed hat, large ruff, and gown with close-fitting sleeves slightly puffed at the shoulders. Behind her are the kneeling figures of her seven daughters in similar gowns, but with calashes or hoods in the place of the hat.

The figures are enclosed by a flat-topped arch, from the centre of which is suspended a shield, bearing Quarterly I. and IV. Vert, an oak tree (arg.), fructed (or). MOREWOOD. II. and III. (Or), a chevron between three martlets gu. STAFFORD.

Below the figures is the inscription :

NERE THIS PLACE LYETH INTERRED Y^e BODIES OF JOHN MOREWOOD GENT: AND GRACE HIS WIFE, BY WHOM HE HAD ISSVE 9 SONNES AND 7 DAUGHTERS. SHE DIED THE 13 OF IULY 1647. AND HE THE 23 OF NOVEMB^r FOLLOWING.

FR: GRIGS: FECIT.

At Upton Cressett, Shropshire, is a brass to Richard Cressett, Esq., and wife Jane, dated 1640, bearing this maker's name, "Fr. Grigs sculpsit."¹ At St. Osyth's, Essex, is a small brass inscription to John Darcy, 1638, which also bears this maker's name, "Fr. Grigs, fecit anno 1640."²

John Morewood, son and heir of Rowland Morewood by Katherine, daughter and co-heiress of Humfrey Stafford, of Eyam, co. Derby, married Grace, a daughter of — Hurst, by whom he had nine sons, Rowland, Andrew, Gilbert, John, Francis, Benjamin, Joseph, Anthony, William; and seven daughters, Anne, Grace, Susan, Mary, Sarah, Priscilla, and Elizabeth. His will is dated 11 October, 1647, and was proved at York on 20 June, 1648.

The tomb is now in the north wall of the north aisle, having been moved when the aisle was rebuilt in 1867. By will dated 6 Oct., 1521, and proved at York 3 July, 1523, Nicholas Boswell desires "to be COWTHORPE.

BRIAN ROUCLYFF, BARON OF THE EXCHEQUER, 1494, AND WIFE JOAN.

Of this once fine and interesting brass but a small portion now remains. In 1845, Mr. Waller communicated to the Archæological Institute the following note:

“The monument of Brian Roclyff is one of peculiar interest. It records the founder and builder of the church, as the inscription states, ‘fundator et constructor hujus ecclesiæ totius operis usque ad consummacionem.’ It is fortunate that this curious portion of the legend yet remains, or did at the time I visited the church, nearly four years since. The founder is represented with his lady holding the model of a church between them; over their heads are canopies and heraldic decorations. I found this interesting memorial in a most disgraceful state of neglect, the canopies much mutilated, many fragments, with escocheons of arms and the whole of the inscription, in the parish chest, liable to constant spoliation; added to this a large stove was placed upon the figures.” (Archæological Journal, Vol. i. p. 69).

About ten years after the date of this communication, thieves carried off more than two-thirds of the brass. The remaining fragments were for many years preserved at the rectory, but eventually, about the year 1886, were placed in a marble tablet, which was inserted in the chancel wall just over the original position of the brass. Meantime the original slab had been removed into the churchyard, where it still remains immediately under the east window. The fragments of the brass which remain consist of (1) the effigy of Brian Rouclyff, (2) the church, (3) the bier, (4) the shield with Rouclyff and Ughtred, (5) two pieces of the finials of the canopy. Fortunately rubbings of the brass are still extant in some of the older collections, whilst the admirable plate in Messrs. Waller’s Series of Monumental Brasses gives the whole design. For permission to reproduce this plate the Society is indebted to Messrs. Waller.

The general plan of the brass consisted of the figures of Brian Rouclyff and his wife holding the model of a church between them, and standing under a double canopy enriched with heraldic devices.

Between the feet of the figures is a curious little subsidiary memorial to John Burgh, and below this an English inscription in eight lines in double columns; another marginal inscription enclosing the whole.

Brian Rouclyff is represented full face in his judicial robes as a baron of the exchequer, but without a coif. His long robe has close-fitting sleeves, the tippet is just shown on the right shoulder, and the mantle buttoned on the same shoulder has a hood. His wife's head is inclined slightly to the right, in order to show the outline of the butterfly head-dress; she wears a close-fitting high-waisted gown, cut low at the neck, and having fur edging and cuffs. His right and her left hand are upraised, their other hand supporting the model of the church. This model shows a church, consisting of chancel, nave, and tower; in the side of the nave is a door with a chess rook, the badge of Rouclyff, above it.

Between the feet of the figures is the small subsidiary memorial to John Burgh, Esq.¹ It consists of a bier covered by a pall, on the side of which is a scroll inscribed:

Orate p' ai'a Joh'is Burgh Armigeri

and above it a shield (Az.), three fleur-de-lys (erm.). BURGH.

Below the figures is the following inscription in black letter, the plate being reversed:

© lord that art of myghtes most § Eternall God in trinite § fadre and son and holy gost § Most humbly we pray vn to the
To shew thy mercy and pyte § On Bryan Rouclyff & Johan his wyff for govt thair synne and Eniquite § And bring thaim to thy ioyfull lyff. Amen.

The canopy is double, of the usual cinquefoiled ogee shape, with cusps and crockets, and side shafts with finials. The arches are respectively inscribed with following sentences from the Service of the Dead:

(Dexter) Credo qd redemptor meus uiuit & in nobisimo die de terra surrecturus su' Et in carne mea uidebo deu' saluatorem meu'.

(Sinister) Nunc Ip'e te petimus miserere quesumus Qui uenisti redimere p'ditos noli dampnari redemptos.

The pediments, main finials, and the spaces between the finials were enriched with shields: those on the dexter side relating to the life, with remainder to Brian Roucliffe, son of Guy Roucliffe and Jennet his wife, the testator's sister, with remainder to Roger, William, Thomas, John, and Robert, brothers of the said Brian. (Test. Ebor. Vol. IV. p. 102, from Dodsworth's MSS.)

Rouclyff, and those on the sinister to the Hammerton family. All these shields had small scrolls attached to the top, inscribed with the names of the families to which they belonged. Messrs. Waller figure five of these shields, but only one now remains. Fortunately Torre has preserved a more complete record, all, save one, being noted in his MSS. collections. They were as follows, on the dexter side (i.e. above the figure of the judge), (1) in the pediment of the canopy, ROUCLYFF (Arg.), on a chevron between three lions' heads erased (gu.), a mullet (or) pierced (of the second) impaling BURGH (Az.), three fleur-de-lys (erm.); (2) on the upper part of the main finial, ROUCLYFF impaling UGHTRED (Gu.), on a cross patonce (or) five mullets (of the field); (3) on the dexter side of the finial, ROUCLYFF impaling ALDBOROUGH¹ (Az.), a fess (arg.) between three crosses crosslet (or); (4) on the sinister side of the finial, BURGH impaling ROOS, of Kendal (Or), three water bougets (sa.). On the sinister side (i.e. above the lady), (1) in the pediment of the canopy, HAMMERTON (Arg.), three hammers 2 and 1 (sa.) impaling ASHTON (Arg.), a mullet (sa.); (2) on the upper part of the main finial, a shield, lost previous to Torre's visit; (3) on the dexter side of the finial, HAMMERTON impaling TEMPEST (Arg.), a bend between six storm finches (sa.); (4) on the sinister side of the finial, ASHTON impaling STANDISH (Az.), three standing dishes (arg.). In addition, Torre notes the indent of a shield immediately below the church, and two other shields between the foot-plate and the marginal inscription. The one below the figure of the judge bore ROUCLYFF impaling HAMMERTON, the other below the lady was lost.²

The chess rook badge occurs seven times on each of the side shafts, and three times on the centre finial.

The marginal inscription in black letter, with a chess rook between each word, was much mutilated at the time Mr. Waller drew his plate. It is luckily preserved almost complete in Dodsworth's MSS. (Bodleian, Oxford, Vol. CLX. fol. 114). The missing portions are here enclosed in brackets :

Hic iacent Brianus Rouclyff [quondam tercius Baro de] Sec'io dn'i xxiiij die marci Anno dn'i Millm'o CCCC° LXXXXIII° & dr'a [Johanna quinto die septembris Anno dn'i M . . .

² For Torre's account of the heraldry the writer is indebted to Mr. Whytehead, of York.

The figures measure 3 feet 2½ inches in height, and the size of the whole composition was 8 feet by 3 feet 8 inches. It is engraved in Waller's Series, pt. vii.

Brian Rouclyff, the son of Guy Rouclyff, recorder of York, by Joan, daughter of Thomas Burgh, of Kirtlington, Notts., was a successful lawyer, and became a Baron of the Exchequer in 1458. He married Joan, daughter of Sir Richard Hammerton by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Ashton, and had an only son John, who married Margaret, daughter and co-heiress of Sir William Plumpton. From this alliance there are many notices of the judge and his family in the Plumpton Correspondence. His will, a lengthy but most interesting and valuable document, is printed in full in Test. Ebor. Vol. iv. p. 102, with many references and notes. It is dated March 12, 1494-5, and proved at York on March 28 following. He desires to be buried in the church of the Friars Minor, at York, near the altar of the Trinity. He also leaves instructions for an epitaph in the Temple church: "Volo quod Jacobus Remus, marbeler, in Poule's church yerde, London, fiat (sic) meum epitaphium in Templo."

On the 28th of November, 1455, Archbishop Booth issued a commission to enquire into the petition of Brian Rouclyff, patron of the living of Cowthorpe, for licence to pull down the old church and erect a new one at his own cost; meantime the parishioners to hear service, &c., in a chapel within the manor house of the said Brian. The commissioners report favourably, and on Feb. 13, 1455-6, the archbishop sanctions the scheme. On Aug. 17, 1458, he desires his suffragan, John, Bishop of Philippiolis, to consecrate the new church. (Ibid. note).

FISHLAKE.

On a high tomb against the north wall of the chancel is the casement of the brass to Richard Marshall, vicar, 1496-1505. The indents are considerably worn, but the general design seems to have been a figure of the vicar combined with a cross; below was an inscription, and below this again a chalice. On each side of the figure were representations of a chalice and wafer, and several scrolls. Dodsworth has preserved the inscription, which is printed in full in Hunter's South Yorks., Vol. I. p. 193, together with a full description of the ornamentation on the sides of the tomb.

FOUNTAINS ABBEY.

The writer is indebted to Mr. W. H. St. John Hope for a rubbing of the curious casement here figured, and for the following notes:

"In the monks' quire in the abbey church of Fountains, and midway between the steps which remain on each side to mark the eastern limit of the stalls, lies a broken slab of grey marble, 9 feet 2 inches long, and 4 feet $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, with the casement of the brass of an abbot.

The brass seems to have represented the abbot in the ordinary habit of a Cistercian monk, the white tunic and cowl, holding a book in his left hand, and his crosier in his right. Above his head, but not on it, was a crocketed mitre without labels. The figure, which was 4 feet $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches high, stood beneath a crocketed canopy with trefoiled arch, supported by pinnacled side shafts. On either side of the upper part of the canopy was a shield of arms. The whole was surrounded by a marginal fillet, $1\frac{3}{4}$ inches wide, with a roundel, $4\frac{3}{4}$ inches in diameter, at every corner for the Evangelistic symbols.

The interest of the slab, apart from its having borne the brass of a Cistercian abbot, lies in the detached mitre.¹ The only parallel to this, which has been noticed, occurs on the casement of the brass to John Morton, archbishop of Canterbury from 1486 to 1500, who was created cardinal in 1493. The greater part of the slab still lies before the site of the altar of Our Lady Undercroft at Canterbury, and shows above the mitred figure of the archbishop the indent of a cardinal's hat and its pendent tasselled cords.

The slab at Fountains, according to Mr. Walbran,¹ was discovered in 1840 by some workmen employed in the abbey, who were anxious to find hidden treasure. Part of it was then taken up and found to cover a grave containing a skeleton. The position of the slab is described by Mr. Walbran, as 'within the foundation of the porch of the screen, between the nave and choir;' but he has evidently mistaken the steps to the stalls for the remains of a screen, and confounded the quire with the presbytery. He accordingly has endeavoured to identify the slab as the memorial of John Ripon, who was abbot from 1414 to 1434-5; but he is expressly recorded to have been buried 'ante introitum Chori, in Navi ecclesie,'² where his two immediate successors were laid beside him. Independently of this the brass was some forty or fifty years later, and must have commemorated another abbot.

The choice appears to lie between John Greenwell, the next abbot, who ruled from 1442 to 1471, and Thomas Swinton, who was elected in 1471 but resigned in 1478-9;³ for the slab can hardly be as late as John Darnton, abbot 1479-1493-4, unless laid down during the opening years of his rule, which is unlikely. Perhaps the mitre may enable us to decide the question.⁴ Its position on the slab, over instead of on the abbot's head, may be a piece of Cistercian humility, but it may also indicate that the abbot had ceased to wear it. Under what circumstances Abbot Greenwell's rule ended we do not know, but Thomas Swinton certainly resigned his office, and it is very likely that the slab is his."

JOHN WATERHOWS, 1530, AND WIFE AGNES.

In Watson's History of Halifax, 1775, p. 390, is a rude woodcut of this brass showing it perfect, but apparently copied from a drawing in Dr. Johnson's MS. collections, for Watson himself says, "In the middle isle of the church, on brass plates, fixed to a seat near the pulpit, which are all torn off except the heads, a man kneeling, with a book in his hand, and opposite to him a woman kneeling, and a string of beads hanging down from her waist." He then gives the inscription, &c.

⁴ When the privilege of wearing the mitre was conferred upon the abbots of Fountains has not yet been ascertained; it was certainly worn by abbots Darnton and Hulby, and two very rich ones are described in the inventory of the abbey. (See Memorials, i. 289, 290).

The two heads were unfortunately stolen during the restoration in the year 1878, and although every effort was made to trace them at the time, no clue could be obtained. The two pieces were very small, the head and shoulders of the man measuring two inches in height, and the head of the lady with a turban head-dress measuring one inch only. The heads are here reproduced, together with the existing fragments of the brass, from a rubbing taken in 1869.

The following pieces still remain in the centre aisle of the church: 1. The inscription in raised black letter, the first and last lines, containing the clauses for prayers for the soul of the deceased, having been defaced, probably by friends in order to prevent the entire demolition of the memorial at the time of the Reformation.

In the top twist of the scroll is the word Th'us. Both these scrolls are in raised black letter.

The different character and style of this plate seems to suggest that it has been substituted for some other device, possibly a representation of the Trinity, removed as objectionable at the same time the clauses in the inscription were defaced.

HALIFAX, W. YORKS.
 REMAINS OF THE WATERHOURS BRASS.
 (The heads are now lost.)

HAMPSTHWAITE.

A CIVILIAN, c. 1350-60.

This small figure, although unfortunately mutilated, is a valuable addition to the somewhat scanty list of civilians of the fourteenth century. In some respects it differs from all the known examples, but may be compared with the small figures in the niches of the canopies on the great Flemish brasses at King's Lynn and Newark.

The figure represents a civilian, c. 1350-60, or perhaps a little earlier, with long flowing hair, beard and moustache, wearing a short close-fitting cote-hardie buttoned down the front, the sleeves also tight and buttoned underneath; over the shoulders a cape with a hood, and from under the former hang the long liripipes or pendent streamers of the hood. Round the hips is a plain belt, to which, on the left side, is fastened a gypciere or pouch, and through this is thrust the anelace or knife. The thighs are clothed in tight-fitting hose. The lower part of the legs and the feet are wanting, a piece is also gone from the head, and the liripipes are broken. The figure in its present condition measures 10 inches in length by 3½ inches from elbow to elbow, and may once have been in the head of a cross, like the well-known example at Taplow, Bucks. The figure seems to have been loose in the church for many years, and as no stone bearing an indent corresponding to it can now be found in the church, it is perhaps useless to speculate as to its identity.

It may even have been imported into the church by the same vandal who in 1570 endeavoured to make it do duty for another person, by roughly cutting the following inscription on the figure :

Prayfe god for ye soule of Ad · dyxon uncle to hycar dyxon
aug 18

The first eight words are in two lines across the breast, the remainder in four lines on the centre, and the date 1570 on the right thigh.

Besides the small figures on the Flemish brasses mentioned before, there is an example of a civilian with close-fitting cote-hardie at Hildersham, Cambs., to Robert de Paris, the date of which is conjectured to be 1379, but the figure has a mantle in addition. Half-effigies wearing the tight cote-hardie with cape and hood are not uncommon in the latter half of the century, in fact they are more numerous than full-length effigies, as at Nutfield, Oxon., c. 1360; Rusper, Sussex; Graveney, Kent; Deddington, Oxon.: all c. 1370.

A small demi-figure in the head of a cross at East Wickham, Kent, c. 1325, much resembles in style the Hampsthwaite figure; and a demi-figure at Upchurch, Kent, may also be compared with it, but neither have the liripipes attached to the hood. The figure at Taplow has the liripipes, but the cote-hardie is long and loose.

The Hampsthwaite brass is engraved in the Transactions of the Monumental Brass Society, Vol. II. p. 150; and in the Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries, 2nd series, Vol. xv. p. 325. It has been inserted into a small stone, at the cost of the Society of Antiquaries, and is now preserved in the vestry of the church.

The plate is fully illustrated in the Antiquary, Vol. xxviii. p. 61, in a paper by the Rev. Dr. Cox, F.S.A., from which it appears that John Reynald, or Raynald, was admitted to the prebend of Beckingham, Southwell Minster, on 5 February, 1492-3, which he resigned in November, 1494. On the 25th of the same month he was instituted to the prebend of Stillington (York), which he held till the time of his death. On 24 August, 1499, he was appointed Archdeacon of Cleveland, and died holding this office on 24 December, 1506. By his will he left his body to be buried in the cathedral church of York, a stone to be placed over his place of sepulchre. The brass appears to have been placed in the museum by the vicar; it was formerly on the chancel floor, and it is much to be desired that it should immediately be replaced, and fastened on a hinge to enable both sides to be inspected.

RICHARD COLHOME, RECTOR OF CAMPSALL, 1425.

Inscription only. Size of plate 30 by 4 inches. Chancel floor.

*Hic iacet magist' Ric'us Colhome nup' p'bendar' p'bend' de Ulveskelf

Amen.*

A rubbing taken in 1844 shows that the inscription was then broken into three pieces, respectively measuring 18½ inches, 6 inches, and 5½ inches. The centre piece is now missing.

Richard Collum, or Colhome, was collated prebendary of Ulskelf, on the 27th of February, 1415-16, and was succeeded by William Grey, 16th July, 1425.

II.

A PRIEST, c. 1480.

Full-length effigy of a priest in surplice, almuce, and cope, much worn but resembling the figure of Thomas Sutton, c. 1480, at West Tanfield, in the North Riding.

Black letter inscription in three lines, nearly effaced :

*Hic iacet Willm's S nup' Canonicus ac prebendarius in ecc'lie vicesimo die mensis
. . . . dn'i M^o xij cui' ai'e p'piciet' de' amen.*

The figure measures 16 inches in height, and the inscription plate is 17 by 2½ inches. The brass lies on the chancel floor on the north side.

A William Gisborne was collated prebendary of Ulskelf, on 7 September, 1479, and was succeeded by Robert Wellington, on 20 October, 1492. This may possibly be his brass.

KIRKHEATON.

ADAM BEAUMONT, Esq., 1655, AND WIFE ELIZABETH.

A late and curious brass. The figures, turned sideways, are engraved on small quadrangular plates, each measuring 13½ by 4½ inches. Above the figures is a shield of arms, and below an inscription and four English verses.

Adam Beaumont is represented bare-headed, with long curly hair; his armour consists of a peaked breastplate, large pauldrons, small coutes, tassets and genouillières in one piece, and heavy jack-boots.

The sword is suspended from a long scarf fastened to the top of the tassets. The position of the hands is curious. By his side is the small figure of his infant son, a most remarkable looking object.

His wife is represented holding an infant in her arms, whilst just behind her is the small figure of her other daughter. She wears a head-dress composed of a long flowing veil, and a gown cut very low at the breast. Round her neck is a string of pearls. Her daughter wears a similar costume, but without any head-dress. The infant wears the long clothes common to all infants of tender age.

Below the figures is the following inscription in Roman capitals:

MEMORIÆ SACRVM.

HERE LYETH ADAM BEAV-MONT ESQ.: HEIRE
APPARENT OF WHITLA, SOVTH-CROSLAND, MEL-TAM, LEPTONS HEATON & MYRFEILD, WHO MAR-

Y^e LORD 17^o: 9^{mo}: 1655. & OF HIS AGE 25.

THEY BEE BVT LIVE NOT, WHO DOE LIVE IN SINNE
THVS MANY WHEN THEY END, ARE TO BEGINNE :
IF LIFE BEE MEASVRED BY ITS GOODNESS THEN THOUGH BVT A-WHILE HEE WAS : HEE LIVED LONGE.

The shield above the figures bears (Gu.), a lion rampant (arg.), armed and langued (az.), within an orle of crescents of the second BEAUMONT impaling (Arg.), on a mullet (sa.), an annulet (or). ASHTON.

The size of the whole composition is 3 feet 8 inches by 1 foot 8 inches. It was found under the wooden flooring of the Beaumont Chapel, during a restoration in 1888.

Adam Beaumont was the son of Sir Thomas Beaumont, of Whitley Beaumont, Knt., by Elizabeth, daughter of Gregory Armitage. He was baptized at Hartshead, March 31st, 1631; married Elizabeth, a daughter of Ralph Ashton, of Middleton, Lancashire, by whom he had a son Richard, and two daughters, Elizabeth and Anne, a posthumous child. He died in the lifetime of his father, November 13th, 1655, and was buried at Kirkheaton.

His will, dated November 12th, 1655, and proved by his widow February 26th, 1655-6, is printed in the Record Series, Vol. ix. p. 90, with notes by Mr. J. W. Clay, F.S.A. To these the writer is indebted for the family details given above.

KIRK SMEATON.

Inscription only. Size of plate $12\frac{1}{2}$ by $8\frac{1}{2}$ inches. Mural. Chancel.

Thomas Walker, rector, 1672.

LAUGHTON-EN-LE-MORTHEN, ST. JOHN.

JOHN MALLEVORER, Esq., c. 1620.

Of this brass the figure of John Mallevorer and the "epitaph" alone remain, but the stone shows the casement for the figure of a lady, two shields below the figures, and a small oblong plate between them. At the head of the stone is a thin square plate (of iron?) without inscription or device, perhaps a later insertion. For these notes and for a rubbing of the brass the writer is indebted to Mr. Walter J. Kaye, F.S.A., who visited the church in 1893.

John Mallevorer is represented bare-headed, with beard and moustache, in armour, with a large ruff round the neck. His armour presents no unusual features, the trunk hose is very large and cumbersome, and the fastening of the dagger by means of a small scarf is well shown. The sword is lost. The figure is inclined to the right, and is broken in places. Both the figure and the "epitaph" have been clumsily refastened with large-headed nails.

Inscription in Roman capitals:

AN EPITAPH ON Y^e RIGHT WO': JOHN MALLEVORER OF LETTWELL IN Y^e COVNTIE OF YORKE ESQVIRE

HE THAT MOST BOVNTIFVLLY FED THE POORE
LOV'D ALL, AND WAS OF ALL BELOV'D, THE STORE OF GENEROVS VERTVES, HE THAT FROM HIS BIRTH
LYV'D SOE, HIS FAME MVST STILL INHABITE EARTH,

HEAVEN KEEPE, HIS MEMORY EACH GOOD MAN'S HART, HIS DVST LYES HERE AND I (A STONE) MVST TELL, MONGST MEN FEW MEN ERE LY'VD & DY'DE SO WELL. T. L.

The figure measures 16 inches in length, and the inscription plate is $15\frac{1}{4}$ by 7 inches. The slab lies on the chancel floor.

John Mallevorer, Esq., J.P., of Letwell, was twice married, first to Dorothy, daughter and heiress of Park; she was buried at St. John's on the 8th of April, 1609. His second wife was Margaret, daughter of John Lewis, of Marr, by whom he had two sons, John, aged one year and a half in 1612; and Thomas, baptized at St. John's on the 23rd of September, 1612. He recorded his pedigree in the Visitation of 1612, but the date of his death is uncertain.

I.

SIR JOHN LANGTON, 1459, AND WIFE EUFEMIA.

Small full-length effigy of Sir John Langton in complete plate armour, with salade helmet. The gorget has a chin piece reaching nearly to the level of the mouth. The pauldron on the left shoulder overlaps the breastplate; that on the right is of lighter construction, in order to give more freedom to the sword arm. The cotes are large and of uniform size, the gauntlets have shell backs and long peaked cuffs. To a short skirt of taces are appended two large and pointed tuilles, the genouillières are large with overlapping plates above and below, and the sollerets are long and pointed. The sword is suspended from a long narrow belt, and under the feet is a small lion.

Below the figures is a three line black letter inscription:

Hic iacent Johannes Langton miles & Eufemia uxor sua qui obiit vicesimo quinto die mensis februarii anno dn'i mill'mo CCCC^o quinquagesimo nono quor' animabus propicietur deus amen.

The figures, measuring respectively 20½ and 20 inches in height, were formerly on the chancel floor, but are now fixed to the wall. The brass is engraved in the Antiquities of Leeds, by James Wardell, 1853, Pl. v. It is somewhat worn, and is rough from oxidation.

With this example may be compared the brasses at Aughton, 1466, figured in the Journal, Vol. XII. p. 196; and at Sprotborough, 1474, also figured in the Journal, Vol. XI. p. 80. The armed figures present the same general features, and in all three cases the ladies are represented as widows, thus making an interesting group of three brasses, either designed by the same hand or emanating from the same workshop.

Sir John Langton, of Farnley, near Leeds, died on the 25th of February, 1459, but his will does not occur in the York Registry. That of his widow Eufemia, dated 26th August, 1463, proved 24th November following, is of great interest. She is described as "Eufemia relictā Johannis Langton militis," and desires to be buried in the parish church of Leedes, "juxta sepulchrum mariti mei." Mentions her sons, John, Henry, William, Thomas, and her daughters, Eufemia (Darcy) and Margaret (Mering). To Henry is bequeathed "unum missale vocatum Bisshop Scrope book." (Test. Ebor. Vol. II. p. 258).

II.

JOHN LANGTON, ESQ., 1467, AND WIFE AGNES.

These figures, 35 inches in height, are almost completely effaced. They still remain on the chancel floor, but the inscription, which is also much worn, especially in the centre, has been taken up and fastened to the wall. The shields are all lost. The effigy of John Langton is headless, and broken in several places; it represents him in armour, with a lion at his feet. His wife appears to have worn a small horned head-dress and close-fitting gown.

Inscription in three lines in black letter; the effaced words are given in brackets from the church notes in Glover's Visitation of 1584-5, printed by J. Foster, 1875, p. 463:

Hic iacent [Johannes] Langton armiger fil' & heres Joh'is Langton Et Agnes [uxor eius qui obiit] in festo sc'i [Lam]berti ep'i anno dn'i [M^oCCCC^oLXVII] quor ai'abz p'picietur deus.

It is much to be regretted that this memorial is in such bad condition, for the will of John Langton, dated 22 December, 6 Edw. IV., gives most minute directions for its erection. He desires "my body to be beried in the parisshe chirch of Ledes in the same place where Agnes late wyfe to me the said John is beried with a stone of marbill to be laid upon us both, with a grete skochon of myn armes and of the armes of my said wife to be set in the mydis of the ston, with all my doghtirs in armes with thair husbandis apon my right syde, and with all my sones and thair wives in armes apon my left side, and with all my fadir, graunsir and auncestres in small skochons at my hed, under the scriptur towarde departed, in lyke wise as ye shall fynd thame at Yorke whar myn auncestre is there." (Test. Ebor. Vol. II. p. 277). The will is unfortunately imperfect.

"Whitaker alludes to this monument in his History of Leeds, Vol. I. p. 45. He describes it as a large black marble stone with the effigies of a male and female figure upon it, which have been originally surrounded by twelve escutcheons. At the feet of the figures is the inscription, of which he professes to give a copy. His version must be an incorrect one, as he makes both husband and wife to die on one day, 'probably,' as he says, 'of some pestilential disorder.' This by no means tallies with John Langton's will, which is dated some years after he and his wife are said to have died. Whitaker has evidently read the inscription incorrectly." (Ibid. note.)

III.

THOMAS CLARELL, VICAR, 1469.

Four "chalice" brasses are in existence in the county, of which this is the latest in point of date. The other examples occur at Ripley, 1429; Bishop Burton, 1460 (see the Journal, Vol. XII. p. 200); and York, St. Michael, Spurriergate, 1466.

In this example the chalice is 9 inches in height, with broad octagonal base, short stem with knot ornamented with oak leaves, and a deep wide bowl.

Below is a four line black letter inscription, measuring 25 by 6 inches:

Ecce sub hoc lapide humat' dn's Thomas Clarell quo'd' hui'
 Eccl'ie venerabilis vicarius qui eandem pluribz decorabit orname't'
 Cancellumqz eiusdem noua historia fabricabit & j die me's' martii
 A° dn'i M° CCCCCLXX° die clausit extremu' cui' ai'e p'piciet' deus ame'.

In Thoresby's time the stone was under the communion table; the brass plates are now fastened to the south wall of the chancel. It is engraved in Wardell's Leeds, pl. vii.; and in the Reliquary, N. S., Vol. v. pl. v. (chalice only).

Thomas Clarell was instituted to the rectory of Kelham, Notts., 19th December, 1428, on the presentation of Welbeck Abbey. This he exchanged with James Baguley for the vicarage of Leeds, to which he was instituted 8th November, 1430, and held until his death. Besides being, as the inscription states, a great benefactor to the church, he also founded a chantry at St. Katherine's altar. (Test. Ebor. Vol. III. p. 247).

V.

MR. WILLIAM MASSIE AND FAMILY, 1709.

A quadrangular plate, 2 feet 8 inches by 2 feet, having in the upper part the effigies of seven of Mr. William Massie's children. The figures are very rudely engraved, and range in height from 5 to $1\frac{3}{4}$ inches. In the centre of the plate is a shield of arms, with helmet, crest, and mantling. The inscription sets out very fully the exact ages of the children, together with the day of birth and the day of death. The whole is enclosed in a floriated border, with cherubs' heads at the corners.

NORMANTON.

I.

A long genealogical inscription with two shields, placed in the church in 1586 by Bridget, daughter of Edward Restwoud, of De La Vache, Buckinghamshire, and widow of Richard Bunny, Esq., of Newton alias Bunny Hall, in the parish of Wakefield.

Now covered by wooden flooring.

II.

Inscription only. Size of plate 18 by 6 inches. Altar tomb. South chapel.

Richard Mallet, 1668.

This plate bears the maker's name, "Tho: Mann Eboraci sculp."

These brasses are fully described in the Journal, Vol. v. p. 267, in a paper on "Monuments in Normanton Church, with genealogical notes," by the late G. W. Tomlinson, F.S.A.

OTLEY.

GENEALOGICAL PLATE OF THE LYNDLAY AND PALMES FAMILY, 1593.

From the inscription on the last roundel recording the pedigree of the Palmes family, viz., "Francis cum hered Hadnall Superstes 1593," it may be inferred that this very curious and interesting plate was erected by Francis Palmes during his lifetime, to set forth the alliance of the Lyndlay and Palmes families, and to state that many of the Lyndlays and the last two of the Palmes' were buried in the church. The accompanying illustration, reproduced from a very careful rubbing taken by Mr. A. Ridley Bax, F.S.A., in 1895, will best explain the design of this plate. In the lower part is the figure of a man (? Francis Palmes) recumbent on a mattress, one end of which is curled up to form a pillow for the head. He is represented with beard and moustache, the hands raised in prayer, and wears a ruff, doublet, and short cloak. By his side is a sword. From this figure springs a tree, with roundels bearing the names and recording the various alliances of the Lyndlay family on the dexter, and of the Palmes family on the sinister side: these unite with the marriage of Brian Palmes with Isabel, daughter and co-heiress of Thomas Lyndlay. This Brian died on the 19th of October, 1528, aged 29, and was succeeded by his son Francis, who married Margaret, daughter of Roger Corbett, of Norton, in Shropshire. He died in 1568, aged 44, and was succeeded by his son Francis, the erector of this plate.

In the centre of the upper part of the plate is a shield, surmounted by helmet, crest, and mantling. The shield bears: Quarterly of six, I. and VI. (Gu.), three fleur-de-lys (arg.), a chief vair, with a crescent for difference. PALMES. II. Ermines, a lion passant (gu.). DREW. III. (Gu.), a bend between two dolphins embowed (arg.). FRENCH. IV. (Arg.), on a bend (az.) three mullets of the field. WYNARD. V. (Arg.), on a chief (sa.) three griffins' heads erased of the field. LYNDLAY.

Crest: A hand holding a palm branch ppr., charged on the wrist with a crescent . . . for difference. PALMES.

Below the shield is the motto: Iustus ut Palma.

At the four corners of the plate are shields, viz., (upper dexter) LYNDLAY; (upper sinister) PALMES; (lower dexter) HADNALL (Or), a maunch (sa.); (lower sinister) CORBETT—(Or), a raven ppr.

At the head of the plate are two Latin verses :

Nec fictum fecialis erat nec munere partum
berum antiqua probant Hoc monumenta genus.

Below the recumbent effigy are the following Latin verses :

Plurima Lindlorum, templo conduntur in isto
Ultima Palmsorum corpora bina iacent
Gloria certa viri non est, sunt omnia uana
Nec faciunt clarum, stemmata clara uirum
Hoc virtutis opus : iustus ceu palma virebit,
Nam dotes animi, nulla sepulchra tegunt

ANNO Dñi : 1593.

The writer is indebted to the Rev. C. G. R. Birch for the following metrical paraphrase of these two inscriptions :

No figment of the herald's craft, nor venally procured,
These ancient monuments declare a race of worth assured.

Most of the Lindlay's ancient stock within these walls do lie
The two last corpses of the Palmes' are also laid there-by Assur'ed fame is not of man—idle his every deed, Nor does illustrious descent alone to honour tend,
That masterpiece of truth, the just like Palms shall flourish wide,
For the rich virtues of the soul no sepulchre can hide.

The plate, which measures $29\frac{1}{2}$ by $17\frac{1}{2}$ inches, is affixed to the wall of the North Transept. It is engraved in Whitaker's Leeds, Vol. II. p. 190, and in Miscellanea Genealogica et Heraldica, 2 S. Vol. v. p. 40.

Francis Palmes, of Lyndley, a justice of the peace for the West Riding of Yorkshire in the second year of King James, married Mary, daughter and co-heiress of Stephen Hadnall, of Shervil, in the county of Southampton. He recorded his pedigree in the Visitation of 1584-5, stating that his eldest son Guy was aged five years at that date.

Haines, in his List of Monumental Brasses, p. 228, mentions a brass to Henry Thoresby, benchet of Lincoln's Inn, and a master of the Chancery, and wife Anne, a daughter of Mr. John Scroope, c. 1640. This is an error, no such brass exists in Otley church.

RAWMARSH.

John Darley, of Kilnehurst, Gent., a younger son of William Darley, of Buttercrambe, Esq., 1616, æt. 75, and wife Alice, a daughter of Christopher Mountfort, Esq., married 47 years, with eight children, Thos., Wm., Frauncis, John, Benedicta, Elizth., Ann, Mary; eight English verses, mural, chancel.

See the Journal, Vol. xi. p. 76.

RIPLEY.

I.

RICHARD KENDALE, M.A., RECTOR, 1429.

An early example of a "chalice" brass. In a paper on "Monumental Brasses in the East Riding," printed in the Journal, Vol. xii. p. 200, the writer of the present paper stated that the "chalice" brass at Bishop Burton, in the East Riding, dated 1460, was the earliest known in the county. For a note and rubbing of this earlier example, as also for rubbings of the other brasses in Ripley church, the writer is indebted to Mr. W. J. Kaye, F.S.A.

This brass consists of an inscription plate measuring 18 inches by 9½ inches, with a small chalice 6½ inches in height below. The chalice is much worn, and has been broken between the knot and the foot. It has a deep hemispherical bowl, long stem with large knot, and a spreading foot.

The inscription is in six lines in large black letter:

Hic iacet bone memorie magist'
Ricardus Kendale quod magist' in Artibz ac rector istius eccl'ie de
Ripley qui obiit quarto die mensis
Januarii A° dn'i M° CCCC° XX° nono
Cuius ai'e propicietur deus Ame'.

The brass lies on the floor near the south wall of the chancel.

KATHERINE, WIFE OF SIR WILLIAM INGELBY, 1500.

Inscription only. Size of plate 19 by 4½ inches.

Chancel floor.

John Ingelby was the eldest son of Sir William and Katherine Ingelby. He married Elinor, a daughter of Sir Marmaduke Constable, of Flamborough.

IV.

ANNE, WIFE OF SIR WILLIAM INGILBY, 1640.

Inscription and eight Latin verses. Size of plate $19\frac{1}{2}$ by 11 inches. Lately replaced in the church, and now mural on the east wall of the Ingilby Chapel.

ROCHE ABBEY.

The writer is indebted to Dr. F. R. Fairbank, F.S.A., for the following account of a curious casement at Roche Abbey, and for the sketch from which the accompanying block has been made.

"When the ruins of Roche Abbey were excavated a few years ago by the owner, the Earl of Scarborough, a small casement of a brass was found cut in the easternmost shaft of the pillar on the north side of the nave, next to the pulpitum. There is nothing to indicate whom the brass commemorated, but close by in the pavement are two incised grave-slabs to the memory of members of the Rilstone family. The casement shows the outline of a figure, apparently of a man in armour, kneeling at a desk, facing to the right. There was a semi-circular inscription plate over the head, and a quadrangular plate beneath the figure. The whole composition is peculiar; it measures $9\frac{1}{2}$ inches in height and $8\frac{1}{2}$ inches in width, as indicated by the casement. The shaft of the pillar is cut away to afford an even surface, and the casement is deeply and sharply cut.

On the back of the figure about the shoulders there is a projection which has a peculiar appearance, and the object of it is not apparent; it forms part of the casement, and is not a blemish in the stone."

ROTHERHAM.

I.

Robert Swifte, Esq., 1561, æt. 84, and first wife Anne, 1539, æt. 67, with four children, William, Robert, Anne, and Margaret; quadrangular plate, mural, altar tomb, north chapel.

See the Journal, Vol. xi. p. 71. The brass is also illustrated in the Gentleman's Magazine, N. S. Vol. vi. pt. i. (1859), p. 356; in a Lithograph by Mr. F. W. Hoyle; and in Guest's History of Rotherham, p. 261.

II.

A shield measuring $6\frac{1}{2}$ by $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches. This is a palimpsest brass, the reverse consisting of a sixteenth century shield with the arms of Melton, viz.: Quarterly, I. (Az.), a cross patonce (arg.). MELTON. II. (Gu.), three lucies hauriant in fess (arg.). LUCY. III. Quarterly 1 and 4 (illegible, but no doubt originally Arg., three chaplets gu. LASCELLES); 2 and 3 (Arg.), two bars (az.), a fleur-de-lys in fess for difference. HILTON. IV. Quarterly 1 and 4 (Arg.), a boar passant (gu.) VERLI [?]; 2 and 3 (Arg.), a helmet (gu.). KILHAM [?].

This shield is much worn and defaced, but the outlines of the charges, except in the case of the Lascelles coat, can easily be made out. The obverse or later side of this shield bears in the upper part an inscription to Ralph Bullock, 1637; the lower portion being filled up with a shield surrounded by scroll work.

The inscription reads:

*Hic Jacet Rodolphus Bullock
De Vnston Armigerū qui obiit 9^o
Die Martii An: Domini 1637^o*

Arms: (Erm.), on a chief (gu.) a label of five points (or). BULLOCK.

This later device is probably the work of some local engraver, who has most ingeniously turned the old shield into a memorial for Ralph Bullock, but has rather blundered in the inscription over the word "armiger," which he has rendered as "armigerum."

This plate is now fastened on a hinge and attached to the wall near the south pier of the chancel arch.

ROTHWELL.

Inscription and arms. Size of plate 10 by 8½ inches. Mural. North aisle.

Peter Collings, of Methley, son and heir of Robert Collings, of Killwick-in-Craven, 1682.

Arms: a chevron between three saltires . . .

RYTHER.

I.

Inscription and three shields. South aisle.

John Robinson, Esq., of Ryther, 1619, æt. 53, and wives, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Richard Rogers, and Susan, daughter of Sir Richard Holmden, by whom he had issue John, Henry, James, Mary, Ann, and Susan.

Arms: Centre (Or) on a chevron (gu.) between three stags trippant (vert) as many cinquefoils (of the first). ROBINSON. Crest: A stag trippant (vert) attired (or) bezanty. (Dexter) ROBINSON impaling Quarterly I. and IV., (Arg.), a mullet (sa.), on a chief (or) a fleur-de-lys (gu.). ROGERS; II. and III., (Or) a fret (sa.) and a chief (gu.). (Sinister) ROBINSON impaling (Sa.), a fess between two chevrons (erm.). HOLMDEN.

II.

Inscription and three shields. South aisle.

Henry Robinson, of the Inner Temple, son of No. I. 1636, æt. 26.

Arms as before, but the Robinson coat charged with a crescent for difference.

SANDAL MAGNA.

Inscription only. Size of plate $15\frac{1}{4}$ by $6\frac{1}{4}$ inches. Waterton chapel.

Mrs. Alice, wife of Mr. Waterton, of Walton, Esq., 1627; with six English verses.

SANDAL PARVA OR KIRK SANDAL.

WILLIAM ROKEBY, ARCHBISHOP OF DUBLIN, 1521.

This brass originally consisted of a small kneeling figure of the archbishop in full robes with mitre and crosier, a scroll from his mouth, four other scrolls, two shields and an inscription.

All that now remains is the inscription, the scroll from his mouth, and two of the side scrolls.

The inscription is in raised black letter, in three lines:

Qui fui Archiepiscopus dublinensis Willm' Rokeby nomi'atus
Et obiit vicesimo octavo die Nobembris anno domini Millesimo Quingentesimo vicesimo primo Cuius anime p'picietur deus Amen.

The scroll from his mouth bears the opening sentence from the Service of the Dead, Credo quod rede'ptor me' vixit, and this is continued on the side scrolls; but only the upper dexter with Quem visurus sum ego ipse non alius, and the lower sinister with Et in carne mea videbo deum salvatorem meum, remain.

Both the shields are now lost, but one bearing the insignia of the ARCHBISHOPRIC OF DUBLIN impaling (Arg.), on a chevron (sa.), between three rooks ppr., as many mullets of the field ROKEBY, was in existence about the year 1850.

The brass is fixed to a panel in the back of a richly canopied high tomb in the north wall of the chantry built by the archbishop on the north side of the chancel. The archbishop himself lies buried in the centre of the chapel under a large stone bearing the following inscription on a brass plate, now covered by a wooden flooring, but here given from Hunter's South Yorkshire, Vol. 1. p. 200:

Heccine qui transis Gulielmi presulis ossa
Sub pede fossa jacent, tu precor, adde preces
Qualis erat, tibi tumba notat constructa sacelli
Ad latus integrum palma relicta sua est
"Credo meus quod vivit," ait, "in carne redemptor Quem visurus ero carnis in effigie"
Sic fatus lachrymans, animam, tibi xpe locavit
Jesu verus amor hanc tuearis. Amen.

To the Rev. C. G. R. Birch the writer is indebted for the following metrical paraphrase of these lines :

Below thy feet, beneath these stones
 Repose the Prelate William's bones.
 For him on high thy prayers prefer
 I beg of thee, O traveller !
 All that he was yon tomb shall tell
 Which fills this chapel's sacred cell :
 His state and honour cast aside,
 "Living Redeemer, mine," he cried,
 "In Thee I trust, whom I shall see
 In mortal flesh assumed for me."
 Thus having said, see him consign
 With tears his soul to Thee benign
 O Christ !—O truest Love Divine
 Protect that charge—for it is Thine !

The will of Archbishop Rokeby, dated 2nd November, 1521, and proved at York 4th February, 1521-2, is printed in full in Test. Ebor. Vol. v. p. 140. He therein desires that "aftir my deth my body be emboweld, and my bowelles and herte to be buried in the church of Halifax w^{yn} the quere; and my body to be buried in the new chapell at Sandall, and there a tomb of stone to be made, about the same to be writen, Ego Willelmus Dublin Archiepiscopus quondam rector istius ecclesie. Credo quod Redemptor meus vivit ect. qui obiit ect. cujus anime propicietur deus. Item, I will that a chapell be made in all convenyent hast at Halifax, on the south side of the church, aftir the discrecion of myne executours and church maisters, and there a tomb to be made w^t myne image, and thereupon writen, Hic jacet cor Willelmi Rokeby nuper Dublin. Archiepiscopi et Vicarii perpetui istius ecclesie qui (ect.) credo (ect.)."

A full list of the archbishop's preferments is given in the notes appended to his will in the volume previously cited. He was instituted to the rectory of Little (or Kirk) Sandal 4th August, 1487, and on 12th June, 1502, to the vicarage of Halifax, which he held till his death. In 1507 he became Bishop of Meath, and in 1511-12 was translated to Dublin.

The chapel built by his executors still remains at Halifax, but the "tombe" has perished. Watson, in his History of Halifax, p. 503, says, "once, if not oftener, the little lead box which contained his heart and bowels has been dug up."

SHEFFIELD, ST. PETER.

I.

Inscription only. Size of plate $17\frac{1}{2}$ by 8 inches. Relaid and now mural in the Shrewsbury chapel.

Here lyeth Elizabeth daughter of Thom's
 Erle of Ormond and of Lora his wyf somtyme wyf to the Lord Mountjoye whiche Elizabeth deceased the XX day of february the yere of o' lord M^o CCCC^o I on whose soule Ehu' haue mercy men.

The engraver has omitted the letter A in the final word. The plate is now very rough from oxidation.

Hunter speaks of this plate as lost in his time; it was luckily recovered and replaced in the church. He also gives the following account of the original stone and of the lady commemorated thereby:

"It should appear from the rough state of the superficies of this stone, that it was formerly if not entirely covered with ornamented brass. Dodsworth describes it as 'a marble stone fairly inlaid with brasse;' and when Sir William Dugdale visited the church there were some armorial insignia upon it, which guide us with greater certainty than the inscription itself to the individual who is here interred. The arms which Dugdale found on this monument were, BUTLER . . . a chief indented . . . , and BUTLER impaling BERKLEY, of Beverstone a chevron between ten crosses palee quartering three fleur-de-lys It remains that we enquire who this lady was, and how it has happened that she has found interment at Sheffield. Thomas Butler, the seventh earl of Ormond, succeeded to that dignity on the reversal of an attainder in the first parliament of Henry VII. He married Anne, daughter and heir of Sir Richard Hankford, by whom he had two daughters, who survived him and became his heirs: the one married Sir James St. Leger, and the other Sir William Boleyn. This inscription and the arms place beyond controversy what Anstis in his Order of the Garter has stated, that the seventh earl of Ormond married a second wife, namely, Lora, daughter of Sir Edward Berkley, of Beverstone, knight, widow 1st of John Blount, Lord Mountjoy; and secondly of Sir Thomas Montgomery, K.G. No other issue of this marriage is known, and the lady here interred must have died in her early youth. Her father died in 1515, very rich and very aged. Her father's sister was the wife of John Talbot, second earl of Shrewsbury." (Hunter's Sheffield, 1819, p. 14, and 2nd edition, 1869, p. 256.)

II.

In Hunter's Sheffield, 1st ed. 1819, p. 148, and 2nd ed. by Alfred Gatty, 1869, p. 257, is an engraving of the splendid monument to George Talbot, K.G., fourth earl of Shrewsbury, dec. 1538, and his two wives, Anne, daughter of William, Lord Hastings, and Elizabeth, daughter and co-heiress of Sir Richard Walden.

On the side of this monument were originally three brass shields, two remain and one is lost. The centre one, surrounded by the garter, bears the arms and quarterings of TALBOT, viz.: Quarterly of six I. (Az.), a lion rampant within a bordure (or). MONTGOMERY. II. (Gu.), a lion rampant within a bordure engrailed (or). TALBOT. III. (Gu.), a saltire (arg.) charged with a martlet (of the field). NEVILL. IV. (Arg.), a bend between six martlets (gu.). FURNIVAL. V. (Or), a fret (gu.). VERDON. VI. (Arg.), two lions passant in pale (gu.). STRANGE. The dexter shield bears TALBOT, as above, impaling (Arg.), a maunch (sa.). HASTINGS. The sinister, now lost, bore TALBOT, as before, impaling (Or), on a bend (gu.) between two cotises (az.) and six martlets (of the second) three dexter wings elevated (arg.). WALDEN. The centre shield, including the garter, measures $8\frac{3}{4}$ by $8\frac{3}{4}$ inches, the other is 7 by 6 inches. The monument is within the Shrewsbury chapel.

SKIPTON-IN-CRAVEN.

During the siege of the castle in the great Civil War, Skipton church suffered severely and was pillaged of its brasses. In 1655 Lady Anne Clifford, Countess of Pembroke, repaired the tower and re-glazed the windows. About the same time she caused to be erected in the church certain tablets, containing long inscriptions to the memory of various members of the Clifford family buried therein. These tablets still remain in the church, and a full description of them may be found in the History of Skipton, by W. H. Dawson, 1882, pp. 173-177. About the year 1825 four fragments of the original brasses were found in pulling down the walls of an old house at Thorlby, near Skipton; these fragments were for many years preserved at the Castle (see Archæological Journal, Vol. vii. p. 304; and Haines' Monumental Brasses, Part II. p. 235).

In 1867 the late Duke of Devonshire entirely renewed the brasses, incorporating into one two of the fragments found at Thorlby.

I.

HENRY, FIRST EARL OF CUMBERLAND, K.G., 1542, AND WIFE MARGARET.

The brass to Sir Henry Clifford, K.G., first Earl of Cumberland, dec. 1542, and second wife Margaret, daughter of Sir Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland, is entirely modern. It was laid down by the late Duke of Devonshire in 1867.

Engravings of this modern brass may be found in Whitaker's Craven, 3rd edition (by A. W. Morant), p. 432; Archæological Journal, Vol. xxxv. p. 92; Dawson's History of Skipton, p. 170; and W. Smith's Old Yorkshire, Vol. for 1881, p. 66.

II.

HENRY, SECOND EARL OF CUMBERLAND, 1570, AND WIFE ANNE.

The brass to Sir Henry Clifford, second Earl of Cumberland, dec. 1570, his second wife Anne, daughter of William, Lord Dacre, of Gillesland, with their two sons, George and Francis, and three daughters, is, with the exception of two pieces, entirely modern. It was also laid down by the late Duke of Devonshire in 1867.

The two original pieces are a small but curious representation of the Trinity and the figure of the second son. These, together with two shields (No. III.), were found, as before stated, at Thorlby.

The Trinity is of an unusual type on brasses: God the Father is represented with the triple crown and seated, the Dove being perched on his right shoulder, whilst Our Lord stands in front of him, his left hand raised to shew the wound in the palm, and the right pointing to the wound in his side. This pretty little composition measures five inches in height, and is unusually interesting as occurring at so late a date.

THE TRINITY.
½-scale.

The figure of the second son measures $13\frac{1}{2}$ inches in height. It represents him kneeling with hands held apart, bare-headed, with short curly hair and beard; over his armour he wears a tabard charged with the arms of CLIFFORD Chequy (or) and (az.) a fess (gu.), the fess charged with an annulet (or) for difference. His armour is richly ornamented, and at his feet is his helmet.

Francis Clifford eventually succeeded to the Earldom of Cumberland, his elder brother George dying without male issue.

Engravings of this brass as restored may be found in Whitaker, 3rd edition, p. 435; Arch. Jour., Vol. xxxv. p. 92; Dawson, p. 170; and Smith, p. 68.

III.

TWO SHIELDS, c. 1600.

These two shields were also found at Thorlby. They may have formed part of the original memorial to Francis, Lord Clifford, infant son of George, third Earl of Cumberland, by Margaret Russell, daughter of the second Earl of Bedford. Francis died in 1588, aged five years and eight months. His tomb was restored by the Lady Anne Clifford, and in 1867 these shields were inserted into the slab. As there is no mark of cadency on the Clifford coat, it is possible they may have belonged to some destroyed memorial to the third earl, who died in 1605, as his present sumptuous monument was only erected in 1654 by his only surviving child, the before-mentioned Lady Anne. They cannot belong to any memorial to his wife, Margaret Russell, as she was buried at Appleby. The shields, each surmounted by an earl's coronet, measure seven inches in height, and are respectively charged with the various quarterings of Clifford and Russell.

SPOFFORTH.

In the Plumpton Correspondence (Camden Society, Vol. iv. p. 75, note) it is stated that "Thomas Middleton, married to a sister of

Sir Robert Plumpton, has a brass to his memory in the church of Spofforth, with this quaint epitaph :

“ With humble prayer I beseech thee
That this scripture shall here or see
To say De profundis if you letterd be
For the soules of Jone my wife and me
Thomas Middleton sometyme man of law
Under this stone am laid full lawe
If thou be unlearned and cannot reed
For our soules and all cristen soules med Say a Pater Noster and Ave and a Creed.

“ Above was the shield of Middleton of Stokeld impaling Plumpton (Dugdale's Yorkshire Arms, MS. in Coll. Arm.). ”

In Test. Ebor. Vol. III. p. 209, note, it is stated : “ There is a brass to commemorate Thomas Midelton in the church of Spofforth,” and the inscription is given, with a reference to the Correspondence.

The present Rector, the Rev. W. Pearson, in a courteous letter, dated November 24th, 1897, says : “ there is no trace of such brass in our church now.”

Through the kindness of Mr. Everard Green, F.S.A., Rouge Dragon, the writer has been enabled to consult Dugdale's MS. in the College of Arms. The entry at folio 41 is as follows : “ Spoford, 16 Septem ber, 1620, super laminam æneam marmori prostrato affixam cærniture effigies hominis armati et uxoris ejus cum istis insignibus et hoc epitaphio.” Here follows the epitaph, as given above, and a sketch of the shield, which bore (Arg.), fretty and a canton (sa.). MIDDLETON impaling (Az.), five fusils in fess (or), each charged with an escallop (gu.). PLUMPTON.

There are numerous references to Thomas Middleton in the Plumpton Correspondence. He married Joan, a daughter of Sir William Plumpton by his first wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Brian Stapilton. Joan was contracted in childhood to marry Thomas, the infant son and heir of Robert Rosse, of Ingmanthorpe, before the feast of Allhallows in the year 1454, but these espousals were not consummated ; and on the 24th of August, 1468, it was agreed between William Middleton of Stokeld, in the parish of Spofforth, and Sir William Plumpton, that Thomas Middleton, son of the said William, should take to wife Jane Plumpton, daughter of the said Sir William, before the feast of St. Michael (p. lxxxii.). On September 12th, the rector of Spofforth was directed to allow the marriage to be celebrated in the chapel of the Holy Trinity at Plumpton (Reg. Neville, i. 104b, from Test. Ebor.).

SPROTBOROUGH.

William Fitz William, Esq., lord of the manor, died at Hathilsay, 1474, in armour with salade, and widow Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Thomas Chaworth, peculiar, chancel.

See The Journal, Vol. xi. p. 80. The brass is also illustrated in Hunter's South Yorkshire, Vol. i. p. 345; Haines' Manual of Brasses, Vol. i. p. 195 (salade); Assoc. Archit. Society Reports, Vol. xviii. part ii., p. 190; The Builder, August 26th, 1893; J. W. Worsfold's History of Haddlesey, p. 85; Thoresby Society, Vol. iv. p. 199 (male effigy only).

THORNHILL.

II. Quarterly (arg.) and (gu.) a bend (az.), over all a label of five points (arg.). III. (Arg.), six pellets, 3, 2, and 1. IV. (Arg.), a bend compony (gu.) and (sa.).

Above this shield on the dexter is a smaller one, bearing WATERHOUSE, with crest an eagle's leg plumed at the thigh (or), and motto VERITAS LIBERAVIT. On the sinister is a lozenge charged with the arms of LACYE, and surmounted by the Lacye knot.

THORPE SALVIN.

Hunter, in his South Yorkshire, Vol. i. p. 312, says:

"There is still remaining the large upper stone of a tomb, which was probably that of the founder, and which was once almost wholly covered with brass. Not a particle of the brass has been suffered to remain attached to this heavy grit-stone, to which it seems originally to have been fastened with great care. We are now left to spell out the design from the marks left upon the stone where the brasses were inserted, and we see that there was first a magnificent cross filling the whole length, with a human figure kneeling at the foot, a label proceeding from his mouth. Beneath were two shields of arms, and at the foot of the cross was an oblong plate of brass, on which must have been an inscription. In the upper part were two figures beneath tabernacle work. Round the whole ran a ledge of brass, which doubtless contained more information respecting the person to whose memory the tomb was consecrated."

In the Transactions of the Monumental Brass Society, Vol. II. p. 189, a member writes under date May, 1894: "A few years ago, when at Thorpe Salvin church during the 'restoration' of the same, I saw the matrix of a large brass (with a few of the nails remaining) broken up and thrown into the churchyard, soon to be carted away (to quote the workmen) as 'old rubbish.'"

THRIBERG.

There is no brass in this church as mentioned by Haines. The memorial to Arnold Reresby, 1485, is an incised slab.

TICKHILL.

WILLIAM ESTFELD, 1386, AND WIFE MARGARET.

Inscription only. Altar tomb. Mural. Chancel. Size of plate 20 by 5½ inches.

I.

MICHAEL DARCY, 1588, AND WIFE MARGARET.

A quadrangular plate $16\frac{3}{4}$ by $16\frac{3}{4}$ inches, much corroded and dented. Mural. South aisle.

The figures are represented kneeling at a prayer-desk, on which lie open books. Michael Darcy is bare-headed in armour, with the smaller figure of his only son John behind him. His wife Margaret wears the "Paris hede," ruff and gown, usual at this period; behind her are the smaller figures of her two daughters, Anne and Margaret, in similar costumes. Above the desk and between the figures is a shield, bearing DARCY with a label of three points impaling (sa.) a chevron between three leopards' faces (or). WENTWORTH.

JOURNAL IN 1718-19

JOHN WARBURTON, F.R.S. and F.S.A., Somerset Herald, appointed June 6, 1720, son of Benjamin Warburton of Bury, in the county of Lancaster,² by Mary, eldest daughter of Michael Buxton of Buxton, in Derbyshire, was born February 28, 1681-2.

In his earlier life he was an excise officer, and was stationed when writing his journal at Bedale in Yorkshire.³ In his journal he refers to some controversies he had been involved in, but whether they arose from his not having properly fulfilled his duties as an exciseman, or from his having been implicated in the rebellion of 1715, there is nothing to shew. When passing through Ainderby Steeple, he took the opportunity of calling on Roger Gale, a Commissioner of Excise, then residing there, and was successful in giving a satisfactory explanation, and received an assurance of the Commissioner's future friendship and assistance.

On his admission to the Society of Antiquaries, he was styled of Bedale in the North Riding of the County of York. He died at his apartments in the College of Arms, his usual residence, May 11, 1759, aged 78, and was buried on the 17th in the south aisle of St. Bennet's Church, Paul's Wharf. A peculiar circumstance attended his funeral. Having a great abhorrence to the idea of worms crawling upon him when dead, he ordered that his body should be inclosed in two coffins, one of lead and the other of oak. The first he directed should be filled with green broom, heather, or ling. In compliance with his desire, a quantity brought from Epping Forest was stuffed extremely close round his body. This fermenting, burst the coffin, and retarded the funeral until part of it was taken out.

No. 911, p. 439. A brief pedigree occurs on p. 297.

³ Various references to his duties as exciseman are jotted down in No. 911.

There is a mezzotint portrait of him by Miller, from a painting of Vandergucht, inscribed, "John Warburton, Esq., Somerset Herald at Arms, Fellow of the Royal Society and of the Antiquarian Society of London, 1746," with a long account of the various maps drawn by him. He published maps by actual survey of the counties of Middlesex, Essex, Herts, York, and Northumberland. He also published "London and Middlesex illustrated," London, 1749, octavo, justifying the arms annexed to the map of Middlesex; "Vallum Romanum," London, 1753, quarto, with cuts. These with some prints were the whole of what he published. His manuscript collections were very great, most, if not all, being preserved amongst the Lansdowne MSS. in the British Museum.

He married twice.¹ His second wife was a widow with children, as he married her son when a minor to one of his daughters. Amelia, another daughter, married John Elphinstone, afterwards vice-admiral and commander-in-chief of the Russian fleet. By his last wife he had John Warburton, Esq., who resided many years in Dublin, and was pursuivant to the Court of Exchequer in Ireland. This Mr. Warburton leaving Ireland, became one of the exons belonging to His Majesty's Yeomen of the Guard at St. James's. Going into France at the time of the Revolution, he was one of the few English who fell victims to the sanguinary temper of the time, being guillotined for a pretended sedition at Lyons in December, 1793.

Grose says Warburton was ignorant of not only the Latin, but his native language. This severe criticism is justified by his journal and note-books. His Latin is generally unintelligible, and his remarks on places and persons very jejune and uninforming. The value of his journal chiefly arises from the notices it contains of places which have since been destroyed or altered, and his giving the names of the owners of the different seats he passed by.

A letter² of his, dated October 19, 1718, explains how he came to have time to make the tour which he describes in this journal. The letter is addressed to the Commissioners of Excise, and in it he requests a respite from business for a few months for the recovery of his health and vigour, and the settling of his private affairs, as the bad state of health which he had so long laboured under, which had been greatly increased by an excess of grief for his late misfortunes agreement for a separation was drawn up, and all he could or would allow his wife was the sum of 10*li*. a year (Ibid., p. 175).

and the loss of their honours' friendship, had brought him to that weakness of body that he was incapacitated from performing as he ought his present employment.

From his journal it would seem that he took it for granted that his request would be complied with, as he left Bedale for his tour on October 15, and at the time he wrote was already at Greta Bridge, where he stayed that day, a Sunday. His first tour lasted from October 15 to November 5, when he had reached Whitby. Leaving Bedale, he went northwards. He crossed the valleys of the Yore, Swale, and Tees, from whence he returned home for a few days. The next time he went eastwards, and after visiting Ainderby Steeple, Arncliffe, and Busby, he made for the sea-coast, along which he continued as far as Whitby. The object of his tour was to make surveys for the map of Yorkshire he was preparing, and to solicit subscriptions. He often refers to this purpose in the journal. At Kirkbridge, near Richmond, Mr. Wilkinson, like others, encouraged his design, and at Richmond he was pleased with his success. He was equally fortunate at Whitby, where he got forty subscribers.

A letter from Thoresby to Bishop Nicholson, dated December 6, 1718, gives a glimpse of Warburton pursuing his journey towards Scarborough, after the close of this portion of the journal. "Your kind wishes for Mr. Warburton's success are efficacious. Besides one letter from himself, I had another from Mr. Robinson,¹ that is very agreeable. I was afraid that the wetness of the season would have prevented his progress in the actual survey, but the said justice acquaints me that the wheel passed by his house in its road from Cleveland towards Scarborough the 24th, and that Mr. Warburton himself staid with him from the 23rd to the 26th. From Scarborough he designs for Bridlington, and thence to Hull, for meeting the shipmasters whilst ashore, and then he designs on a visit at Leeds. He has already about 300 subscribers." He must have returned home some time during the winter, as on February 9 in the following year, 1718-19,² he went on a second tour. Starting again from Bedale he turned his face southwards, and visiting a few places in the North Riding he soon entered the West Riding, in which he continued to the end of this portion of his journal, where we lose sight of him at "Black Barnsley."

² The year of the second portion of the journal is not quite certain. Warburton gives dates which do not harmonise with any one year. He speaks of February 13 falling on a Saturday, although he has just called the day previous the 13th. Later on, Thursday is the 19th, and the following Friday and Saturday, the 21st and 22nd. The illegibility of this portion of the manuscript makes it more difficult to ascertain the true date.

When in Leeds he lodged with Thoresby, who gave him a very agreeable entertainment in viewing at leisure his curious collection of natural and artificial rarities, and manuscripts.

Thoresby, in a letter to Dr. Charlett, dated January 17 in this year, says he had assisted Warburton with the Roman Way through the county, and hoped that he would be able to improve it by actual survey. In another letter, dated May 13, he says that Warburton had been with him four days the week before, and that the North and East Ridings were actually surveyed, and a large portion of the West Riding. "I am mightily pleased with his performance" are his words.

In his diary for October 19, 1719, Thoresby notes: "Set forward with Mr. Warburton and my little son Richard for York. When we were out of the town he drove the chaise himself, that we might have more enjoyment of each other's company. Here (Streethouses, near Tadcaster) we baited, and after escaping danger from the unruliness of the horse, that ran the chaise backwards up a steep bank, Mr. Warburton himself conducted me to York."

A letter dated April 2 in the year following gives the last mention made by Thoresby about the map. "In the last letter I had from Mr. Warburton, he says he is in great forwardness. To my knowledge, the last quarter of the map in four skins of parchment, very curiously protracted (sic), was sent some time ago from Leeds for his finishing stroke. I hope it will give great content, but he is so taken up with his new honours (Somerset Herald, F.R.S. and F.S.A.) that he forgets his old friends. Since the above was writ, the post has brought me a letter from Mr. Warburton, who says he has employed so many of the top workmen in London, that the map will be ready to be delivered the middle of next month."

Notwithstanding Thoresby's laudatory notice and the expense and trouble Warburton put himself to, the map is a very mediocre performance. It is, however, very rare. There is no example in the British Museum, and the only place where it is known that a copy is preserved is the Public Library at Bradford; and even here it is not quite perfect, as the sheet with the shields of arms is wanting.

Warburton's real title to the gratitude of posterity is his collection of excellent drawings of gentlemen's seats and places of interest in Yorkshire, preserved amongst the Lansdowne MSS. They are drawn partly in pencil, and partly in ink; and when reproduced, as they well deserve to be, must be redrawn. In many cases, the edifices which he drew have been destroyed or altered beyond recognition, so that these drawings are the only memorials remaining. A list of them is given at the conclusion of this article.

(346) 1718. A day-book of memoranda for the journal.

(346b) October 15. Went to Patrick Brunton, a small village on the north side of a small river, called Bedale Beck, which gives name to y^e parish. Thence to Finkle² at 2 miles distance, where there is a little church at about $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile from the town. Thence to Wenchley,³ a large church town, well built, and situated on the north bank of the river Ure, over which there is a good stone bridge, built, as Mr. Leland saith,⁴ by a parson of the town. The church is a goodly edifice, but at present out of repair, the steeple thereof having been lately blown down, and the church thereby sore damaged. The present incumbent is the Rev^d. Mr. Clayton. From Wensley to Boulton Hall,⁵ a mile and half, w^{ch} place is remarkable for its situation and the frolick of its late owner, (347) His Grace the Duke of Bolton. The house, w^{ch} stands on the north side of a fertile vally, called Wenchey Dale, through w^{ch} the river Ure runneth, is almost buried in trees, w^{ch} are cut into beautiful avenues. The hall, w^{ch} is a very firm piece of architecture, was greatly improved in about the year '84, when His Grace the Duke of Bolton resided at it, and the addition of severall terraces, walks to the garding, fountains, fish ponds, etc. It is at present the habitation of Tho. Pulleyn, Esq.,⁶ famous for his success in horse-coursing, and for being some years since Stud Master to His Maj^{ty} K[ing] W[illiam] 3^d, who is master of a very valluable collection of plate, w^{ch} he hath won by horse-racing.

From Boulton Hall I passd through Leyburn, a considerable town and well built, and not many years since had a charter (347b) granted for a market to be kept in it every (blank), and 2 faires in the yeare, viz. (sic). Its chief Lorde is the present Duke of Bolton.

From Leyburn to Bellerby, one mile, w^{ch} anciently belonged to a family of the same name, and bore for their arms, Or a cross gules charged with (five) bells of y^e 1st.⁷ From Bellerby to Wa[l]burn Hall, 1 mile, and belonging to Sir Roger Beckwith, Bart, of Aldbrough near

³ Wensley.

⁴ "The fayre bridge of 3 or four arches that is on the Ure at Wencelawe, a mile or more above Middleham, was made 200 yers ago and more by one caullyed Alwyne, parson of Wencelaw (Yorkshire Archæol. Journal, x. 473).

⁵ Built about 1678.

⁷ Visitations of Yorkshire, 1584-5 and 1612, p. 61. There are many notices about the family of Bellerby in the Raine MSS. at Durham, derived from Mr. Timothy Hutton's papers at Marske Hall. From these it appears that Henry de Bellerby had four daughters (1) Maude

Rippon. It is an ancient pile, but somewhat ruinous. It is encompassed with a very strong wall, embattled on the top, and in the Civill Warr time was ga(risoned) against the King. It likewise belonged to the Bellerbys, as appears by their arms in the Hall window as above, and impaled wth Or a chevron between 3 ravens sable,¹ and another coat, quarterly:—1 Gules a cross or.² 2^d Or a cross gules charged with (five) bell of the 1st. Thursday, October 16, m. 9. Went from Walburn Hall to Richmond, about 2 miles of moorish ground and bad way, and from thence by Ask Hall, belonging to His Grace the Duke of Wharton, to Gilling, a large church town, standing in a vally, not far from which is Sadbery, the seat of (James) Darcy, Esq., and Gillingwood, of (William) Wharton, Esq. Lodgd all night with Mr. Matt. Smailes, an attorney-at-law, in the town, and on (348b) Friday, 17, m. 10, left Gilling and crossed Gatherley Moor, where there is a very intire military way, w^{ch} hath its beginning at Bulness,³ and after having passed Cumberland and Westmerland, on this moor meteth with the Ermin Street. Here are likewise severall large camps, encompassd with deep trenches, and one very remarkable trench that crosseth the moor from north to south, and seems to be a part of the Scottish Dike in Northumberland. Near to Gatherley Moor is Melsonby, a considerable village and a good church in it. Ye present incumbent

(3) Margaret married (a) Peter Greathead, by whom she had a daughter Agnes, wife of Richard Sidgwick, and mother of Thomas Sidgwick; (b) secondly, William Dalton, of Barnard Castle. (4) Beatrix married (a) Walter de Yafford, and had by him a daughter Agnes; (b) Nicholas Bagot, of Crathorne (both alive in 1395), whose son Peter married her daughter Agnes, who married as her second husband Norman Carnaby (alive 1439).

² Possibly Ughtred or Oughtred, the cross in which is generally patonce. The following memoranda from the Raine MSS. relating to Walburn are not without interest. "Joseph Miller, of Richmond, lived with Mr. Timothy Hutton at Middleham, and is supposed to have some of the old painted glass from the windows at Walburn Hall. The furniture was packed up by the Sturdys of Middleham. Miller says he was not present at the time. He says he recollects the glass very well, but does not know what became of it. It used to be in a drawer. Much fine old panelling and woodwork in the house was removed at the alterations. One woman got enough given her to make a partition between two rooms."

of w^{ch} is one Mr. Smith, who hath built a new parsonage house for his successors. He is a person of great knowledge and affability, and treated me at his house with a great deal of respect. From Melsonby to Aldbrough, a considerable village, where I was kindly entertained by one Watson, a rich yeoman (349). From Aldbrough I crossd severall large trenches to Stanwick, the seat of Sir Hugh Smithson, Bart, a large well built house with 3 cupiloes on the top, etc. From Stanwick to Cliff (3 miles), the seat of William Witham, esq., a gentleman of fine parts and great curtesie. Here I was kindly entertained all night, and on the Saturday, 18th February,¹ waited on William Wilkinson, esq.,² at Kirkbrigg, who received me kindly, and, as all the rest had done, encouraged my design. And from thence returned to Aldbrough, where I dined with (George) Meynell, esq., who hath a pretty seat and a liberal sperit. In the evening I went to Wykcliff, the seat of Marmaduke Tunstall, esq., w^{ch} is prettily situated on the south bank of the river Tees. The house is a very compact, regular, ancient building, with a wall and gatehouse before it, (349^b) very well furnished on y^e inside with paintings, and but few good ones, excepting two family peices, w^{ch} seemd to be of Sir Peter Lilly's workmanship. Afterwards went to Greata Bridge, where I rested all Sunday, 19th, and on Monday, 20th, went by Ethelstan Abby and Bernard Castle to Lartington, the seat of Thomas Maire, esq. The house is large and well built of free stone, and situated on the south bank of the river Tees. The chief part of my business in this part was to find out the course of the Roman military way that I traced through Northumberland, w^{ch} Mr. Maire gave me great assistance in, and I find that it hath crossed y^e river Tees at Stratford near Bernard Castle. This day I dined with Tho. Robinson, esq., of Rookby, who shewd me a very intire Roman altar with this inscription on it³ (350). In the evening I came to Gales, where I stayd all night with Solomon Wykcliff, esq.

21, Tuesday. The first visit I made this day was at Gilling Wood to (William) Wharton, esq., who hath a pretty seat incompassd with wood, and some good paintings in it. From thence I went to Sadbury, the seat of (James) Darcy, esq.,⁴ which is a most beautiful seat, and most of his own erecting, very richly furnished on y^e inside, and some good paintings by the hand of Murry and Charett.⁵ In the evening went to Hannaby,⁶ the seat of Sir Ralph Milbank, Bart, where I lodgd all night, and was very kindly receivd. Here I likewise saw two original paintings, but know not the master.

² Query if this should not be Thomas Wilkinson. If so, the son of James Wilkinson, of Kirkbrigg, who entered his pedigree at Dugdale's Visitation. Buried at Stanwick, February 18, 1718-9. He left only daughters. A drawing of "Kirkbridge, the seat of Tho. Wilkinson, esq., from the south," fo. 312.

⁴ James Darcy, sixth son of Conyers, Lord Darcy, purchased Sedbury, and was father of James Darcy, who was living there when Warburton visited it. He was created Lord Darcy of Navan in 1721, but left no male issue.

⁵ What painters are meant? Had Mr. Darcy been hoaxing Warburton?

⁶ Warburton made a drawing of it from the south.

Wednesday, 22^d. This morning I went to Croft, where I was kindly entertained by Mr. Bell, the present Rector, and very agreeably entertained with the sight of severall of Sir Peter Lilley's paintings, and in the evening lodgd at Moulton, the seat of (blank) Routh, esq.

(350^b) Thursday, 23rd. The first visit I made this day was to Edward Goddard, esq., at Richmond, from w^{ch} place I went to Mr. Robinson's of Easby, Mr. Darcy of Colburn, Mr. Wilkes of Tunstall, Mr. Evison and Mr. Croft of Appleton. From which last place I returned home to Bedall, well pleasd with my success. I restd at home untill Tuesday following, viz.

The 28th, m. 9. I reachd Ainderby Steeple, the seat of (John) Waistell, esq., where the Hon^{ble} Roger Gale, esq.,¹ Commissioner of Excise, was at that time, who at first receivd me with some coldness, but after a short account of the villainous usage I'd had by my enimes in the late controversy, gave me an assurance of his future friendship and assistance. Having ended my visit at m. 11 I proceeded on my way for Cleveland, and at E. 2 reachd Arncliffe Hall,² the seat of Timo. Malleverer, esq., w^{ch} is an ancient seat that formerly belongd to the Colvils, whose (351) heir general was married to Sir William Mauleverer, K^t, of Woodsome, and hath since been in the possession of that family.³ Here I rested all night, and on Wednesday 29th in the morning I passed by Wharilton Castle, and at m. 11 reached Little Bushby, the seat of Sir Henry Marwood, Bart, who recieved me with y^e greatest respect, and gave me a very agreeable entertainment in the sight of his fine appartment, painting, shells, coins, and other curiositys. In the evening I went to Acklam, the seat of Sir William Hustler, K^t, to w^{ch} place I got at E. 7.

Thursday 30th. The forenoon was spent in viewing the fine walks, vistles, fountains, etc., of this beautifull seat, and the afternoon in the

the character of his most intimate associates may be easily conjectured. He was the first vice-president of the Society of Antiquaries, and treasurer to the Royal Society. He died at Scruton, June 28, 1744, in the seventy-second year of his age. (Whitaker's Richmondshire, ii., 72.)

interiour parts thereof, and in copeing a list of the persons of distinction in each particular wapentack in this county, as collected by Sir William himself.

(351^b) Fryday, 31st, I spent in viewing the course of the river Tees along with Sir William and his son. Went to Middlesburg, formerly a little religious cell to y^e Abby of Whitby. Afterwards to Ormsby and Normanby, the last of w^{ch} places is a pretty seat belonging to (William) Pennymann, esq. Thence by Wilton Castle, an ancient pile belonging to Sir Stephen Fox, K^t, to Kirkletham, the seat of Charles¹ Turner, esq. Here I was receivd with the greatest² respect imaginable.

Saturday, November 1st. The forepart of this day I spent in viewing the Hospital, w^{ch} Sir William Turner, sometime Lord Mayor of London, built and endowd for 40 poor people, aged and child[less], and the fine Free School erected after his death by his executors, and is more like a palace than a school. (352) Likewise the sumptuous house of Charles Turner, esq., w^{ch} is no less remarkable for its hospitality and good furniture, then for y^e emence value of the plate, in w^{ch} one gold cup w^{ch} I saw cost £800, and a dish of silver (blank), besides other great utensils, no less remarkable for the fineness of their workmanship and value. Here I rested all Satturday and early on the morning on Sunday 2^d. Early this morning I took horse and followd y^e course of the sea to Marsk,³ where there is a goodly stone edifice, belonging to Sir William Lowther, Bart, and from thence to Skelton Castle,⁴ the seat of Law[son] Trotter, esq., who hath made great improvements therein, by converting the best part of y^e old edifice into new fashiond rooms. There is an old pile adjoyning, called Huntle Tower, where the records of the county is said to have been formerly kept. At M^g 11 I reachd Loftus, the seat of W^m Moor, esq., where I stayd dinner, and in the evening went to Stathes, where I lodgd all night.

(351^b) Monday 3rd. The first visit that I made this morning was to Mr. Osbaldeston, Rector of Hinderwell, and from there to Mr. Moor's of Newton, from whence I went to Whitby, where I restd all the two following days and got 40 subscribers.

(378) Feb. 9th. Left Bedale and came in the evening to Aldbrough, the seat of Sr Rog^r Beckwith, Bart,⁵ where I continued untill y^e 10, m. 10 (and having left my sister B. there) proceed(ed) through Massham, a small market town on the west bank of the river Ure, a good church spire steeple in it. At $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile beyond w^{ch} I crossed over a rivulet called Bowrne by a stone bridge of one arch, not long since erected, and at $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile further west came to Swinton, the seat of Sr Abstrupus Danby,¹ a fine regular, new built edifice, of a square figure, and situated on an assent, beautify^d wth good garden, walks, po . . . , and out houses. Thence I turned to the south (378*b*) and passed through a village called Grewelthorp, near to w^{ch} is a fortified moat called the Castle Hill (belonging to Sr Henry Goodrick, Bart), w^{ch} I am inclind to believe a work of the Romans, and that the Roman Cawsway w^{ch} came from Cataractonium in Kilgram Bridge, is continued to it. Att 2 miles further I passd by a large hall—like house called² w^{ch} belongs to Beckwith, esq., of Thurcroft. And at one mile further came to Hington, a small village, in w^{ch} is a commodious house, the seat of Mat. Wray, gent. From thence I turnd again to the west, and at $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, having passd through open ground (379) full of wood, came to Assenby, the seat of Dawson, esq.,³ whose house hath nothing about it worthy of remark. Afterwards I went to Rippon, a large corporation burr[ough] town, etc.

⁵ Sir Roger Beckwith was High Sheriff of Yorkshire in 1706. Married, October

(Feb.) 11. Having taken in the subscriptions for Rippon, visited one Mr. Ridsdale, regest[rar] for the Archbishop of York. I rid to Studley Park at 2 small miles distance, belonging to John Aisleby, esq.,⁴ whose present house hath nothing in it of extraordinary note, but then that it was the old seat of the Mallorys, a family of note, whose only daughter⁵ the present owner married. But what is wanted in beauty of building, is fully made up in a most delightful (379*b*) situation and park, w^{ch} for variety of prospect in vистоes, avenues, fishponds, etc., is hardly to be exceeded, and indeed parraleld, and is intended shortly to be improved by a shutable house and garding. From Stoodley I proceeded to Fountains⁶ Abby, whose most venerable ruin gave me a surprize, it being one of (the) largest I have yet seen. It is situated in a low bottom, full of wood and allmost inclosed with rocks, and sufficiently shews the great piety, charity, and resignation of our ancestors. It hath a small rivulet (w^{ch}) runneth close by its walls, and at a stone's cast distance a goodly stone house built on the foundation of the apartments, where the religious married Mr. George Aislabie, of York, father of Sir John Aislabie. She was not the only daughter.

used (380) to entertaine their visitors, and now the seat of Messenger, esq., whose family had it from the Proctors, who purchased it and the Monastery at the Dissolution. And in the Hall window are a great many coats of arms, well preserved, of the marriages of several of the Proctors. Mr. Messenger shewed me the Abbot's court seal, and a signet of near $1\frac{1}{2}$ in. in diameter. From thence I proceeded by Mickle How Hill, a remarkable mount for its extensive prospect to Thornton, the seat of Ingleby, esq., situated at the north end of the moor of the same name, over w^{ch} I take the Roman Cawseyway to be continued to Ripley.

(380b) From whence I came and was kindly receivd by Sr John Ingleby, Bart, whose ancient seat is situated at the west end of the town, and greatly improv'd by him of late years, both on the inside and the out. Here I stayd all night, and beside a most sumptuous entertainment, a hearty welcome, and a generous encouragement of my affaire, was favoured with the sight of a fine and very valuable collection of gold and silver coins and medals, w^{ch} his most excellent Lady hath amassed together; as likewise by several rare MSS. on vellum, w^{ch} Sr John is possessd of—as the Coucher Book of Bridlington Abby in a large folio, another full of charters and grants belonging to Fountaines Abby and the Priory of Rippon, and some other monasteries. Another entitled (381), in Old English, wth others in quarto, relating to various subjects.

From yt I went to Nyd, the seat of Fr. Traps, esq., w^{ch} is pleasantly situated on the north bank of the river Nyd, but hath nothing in the structure worthy of note. From thence crossing over a I came to Brereton, a small village, and over a cawsey came to Cotgrave,¹ the seat of Henry Hodges, esq., pleasantly situated on a rising ground on the east bank of a rivulet, a very neat and regular building of brick

(Feb.) 13, m. 10. Having rid round the ruins of the large castle of Knaresburgh, of w^{ch} here is a scetch² (382), I followed the course of the river Nid to a church.³ Thence crossing that river by a stone bridge of 3 arches. At 200 yards' distance from it I was shewd the Dropping Well, w^{ch} is nothing but a large rock of petrefyd earth, from w^{ch} watter continually distills in to the river, after the maner of this draught,⁴ (382b)⁵ called St. Robert's Chapell, w^{ch} is very neatly cut out in the bottome of a high piece of a square figure, 3 yards each way, hath a neat altar and nitch, adorn'd wth two pillers on the sides of it, and a ray or

Continuing still along the forest I left Pannel on the left at one mile further on a bottome on the same and shortly having (385) after pas^d through Stainburn, an inconsiderable on the top of an eminence, that overlooks the whole country round it, and at a mile to the S.E. of it lieth a noted rocky hill, called Amers Cliff.⁶ $\frac{1}{2}$ mile further cross^d a rivulet in a vally, and $\frac{1}{2}$ further than that left Lynley vilage on the right, situated on the point of a hill, and at half a mile yet further came to Leathly village, church, town, and seat of Robert Hitch, esq.,⁷ representative in Parliament for the Borough of Knaresb[rough], a large and convenient edifice as at present improv^d by the worthy owner, who hath been at a great exp[ence] in adorning and beautifying it wth a new south front, a wing to the east and outhouses and offices, gardens, and other embelishments, where I stayd all night.

(385b) And at m. 8, Saturday the (13)⁸ took horse, and at 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ mile to the west came to Farnley, the seat of Francis Fawkes, esq., pleasantly situated on the N. bank of the river Querff, of w^{ch} here sheweth a scetch (386).⁹ Still continuing near the river Wherf, at a mile further, I came to Newell, the seat of . . . There are several other antique stones to be seen in the wall of the churchyard (387), with draggons, bunches of grapes, and other figures upon them, as is the cross in the churchyard. The Rev^d Mr. Rhodes, the vicar, likewise shewd me the area of the old castrum, and he shewd me the course of a Roman way, coming from the north and running southwards to Aldmonbury. At Ilkley I cross'd Wharff by a stone bridg of 3 arches, left Addingham 2 miles to y^e left, . . . From thence I continued along the river Wherff by Healagh mannor w^{ch} is now in ruin, (395) and at one mile further cross^d east by a bridg of 9 arches to Tadcaster, where I continued all night at ye Rowbuck.

Friday 21,⁸ m. 10. Took horse and having viewed the Church, Town and Castle Hill, went by Lucerne, the seat of Bosville esq., w^{ch} is situated on a rising ground in this form.⁹ There is a bathing well near unto it, walled about. Continuing along the west side of Wherff at $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile further I came to Newton¹ a neat new built house belonging to Captain Fairfax esq. of Leeds, wth a church close by it, (395) and soon after I came to Towson Hall, a good edifice, belonging to Fairfax, whose mother and sisters boards with their tenants there, thus.² Near to it is Oglethorp Hall belonging to Burnet, seated amongst trees. Thence crossing Bramham Moor about the of it I plainly discovered three contrary ways to cross one another thus, (396) the first from Aberford to York through Tadcaster, from w^{ch} there goes a branch to St Hellen's ford, and intersected by one from Ilkley, w^{ch} joyns to that to York at the moor head. After I had completed my surveys of these roads I went to Haslewood, y^e seat of St Peter Vavasour³ Bart, w^{ch} is the ancient seat of a family of the same name. It is a large fabrick of the stone wth w^{ch} York Minster is built in this form.⁴

(396b) From Hesslewood I pass^d through Aberford, a mean town on the great military way, and at $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile further to the west came to Parlington, the seat of St John Gascoigne, a Bart of Scotland, w^{ch} is situated in a bottom on the south side of the river Cock, and is in this form.⁵ Here I stay'd all night and on Saturday the 22,⁶ m. 10, took horse, and crossing the small river Cock on the further of it obs[erved] a large bank of earth to run parallel unto it from Berwick forward to Aberford, w^{ch} I want to [be] better informd of. Thence going through Trotter Wood went close by a good stone house called and belonging to Whitehead in York.⁷ (397) Thence crossing the west end of Bramham Moor at 2 miles distance I came to Bramham Biggin, the seat of Chr. Armitage esq.,⁸ situate in a bottom and of this form.⁹ There I made a short stay, and at $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile more west had a view of Bramham Park the seat of the Right Hon. the L^d Bingley,¹⁰ w^{ch} appears thus.⁹ Thence crossing (397b) Hope Hall, belonging to Mr. Marshall, Postmaster of Tadcaster. Bramham Town hath a spire steeple. Having viewd this fine seat of Bramham Park and the gardings &c., I went to Kiddal, the seat of Ellis esq., of this figure.¹¹ Thence crossing a moor with cole pits on it, at 3 miles further came to Austrop, the seat of Nicholas Moor esq.,¹² who hath a good

² Drawings of Toulston Hall and Oglethorp Hall.

³ According to the Baronetages this should be Sir Walter Vavasour.

⁵ Drawing almost obliterated.

⁷ A poor drawing.

¹⁰ Robert Benson, son of Robert Benson of Wrenthorp, M.P. for York, Chancellor of the Exchequer, 1711, created Lord Bingley, July 20, 1713, obtained from the Crown the grant of Bramham Moor, died April 7, 1731, buried in Westminster Abbey.

colliary adjoining, and a fire engine, w^{ch} I saw working. There I continued all Sunday, and on Monday morning breakfasted wth Mr. Nowell at Whitkirk, and from thence to Leeds, leaving (398) Ossingthorp¹ on the right and Knowsthorp on the left. During my stay in Leeds, w^{ch} was till Thursday morning, all w^{ch} time I lodgd with Mr. Thoresby, who gave me a very agreeable entertainment in viewing at leisure his curious collection of natural and artificial rarities, MSS., etc.

From Leeds I passed through Hunslet and at a mile further over a moor and by Thorp Super Montem, soon after over a large comon to Renthorp,² the seat of the L^d Bingleys; and at a mile further entered Wakefield, a large populous trading town. There I continued untill Thursday following, having made several visits in the neighbourhood, as at Stanley Heath (Smith esq.), Walton (Watterton), Cheat,³ Wooley (Wentworth), Chappel Thorp (Beaumont esq.), Kettlethorp (Gen^l Norton gent.), Numler Dam,⁴ Sandal Castle and Town, formerly the seat of the famous E[arls] Warren, Lupset the seat of (399) Richard Witton esq. From Wakefield I went to Black Barnsley most by open and unlevel ground. It is a town of good trade and situated on the brink of an hill.

AN INVENTORY OF THE GOODS AND PLATE BELONGING TO THE CHAPEL OF ST. MARY UPON THE BRIDGE AT WAKEFIELD,
 IN 1498.

By JOHN W. WALKER, F.S.A.

In the Society's Journal for 1891 (Vol. XI., p. 144), the history of St. Mary's Chapel upon Wakefield Bridge is fully detailed, and it is there shown how the building came, after the dissolution of the chantry chapels, into the hands of the governors of the Wakefield charities.

A few weeks ago a search was instituted through an old chest of deeds, the property of the governors, and among other interesting documents was found a parchment, $7\frac{1}{4}$ inches in length and 12 inches from side to side, in very good condition, which once had a seal attached, but this has now disappeared.

The inventory was made by Sir John Savyle, of Lupset, Knight, Steward of the manor of Wakefield, and deputy to Thomas Rotherham, Archbishop of York, who built the bridge-chapel at Rotherham, and reads as follows:—

This endenture made the xijth day of August the xijth yere of the reign of Kyng Henry the vijth betwix Sir John Savyle Knyght Styward of the lordship of Wakefeld deputie to my lord of York on the one partie And Sir Richard Sykes and Sir William Joice preste³ at the chapell of the brigge of the town of Wakefeld on the oþer partie Witnessith that the goodes underwritten resteth in the kepyng of the seid Sir Richard and Sir William. first a ryng of gold, a salowe¹ of gold, a crosse of gold, a nowche² of gold, the wiche weies iij quartains of an unce. TOWNELEY, WIDKIRK, OR WAKEFIELD PLAYS?

By MATTHEW H. PEACOCK, M.A., B.Mus.

At the sale of the Library of the Towneley family, of Towneley Hall in Lancashire, which was held in Evans' Rooms, Pall Mall, in the year 1814, a manuscript volume, written on vellum in the style of the 15th century, was sold to Mr. John Louis Goldsmid. The volume contained thirty-two Mystery Plays, some being unfortunately in an incomplete condition; but it must once have contained more, since twelve leaves are apparently lost between the first and second plays, two more are missing at the end of the fourth, two more at the end of the seventeenth, and twelve more at the end of the twenty-ninth. These missing leaves would provide room for four additional plays, as well as for the lost portions of the incomplete ones. The volume did not long remain in Mr. Goldsmid's hands, for he disposed of it to Mr. North, and in the year 1822 it was once more in the possession of the Towneleys, in whose care it remained until another sale of their manuscripts at Sotheby's Auction Rooms in 1883; it was then purchased by Mr. Bernard Quaritch, who still remains the owner.

The manuscript was first printed in its entirety by the Surtees Society¹ in the year 1836, under the title of "The Towneley Mysteries," but before this date the thirtieth play had been contributed by Mr. Peregrine Edward Towneley in 1822 to the publications of the Roxburgh Club, with an introduction by Mr. Douce. The thirteenth play forms one of Mr. Collier's "Five Miracle Plays," published in 1836; the third play was printed by Mätzner in his "Altenglischen Sprachproben," at Berlin, in 1867; five of the plays were printed by Miss Toulmin Smith in her admirable edition of the "York Plays" in 1886; and the thirteenth was inserted in Mr. A. W. Pollard's "English Miracle Plays," published in 1890. A complete edition has also been published under the auspices of the Early English Text Society,² Mr. George England being responsible for the transcription of the text, and Mr. A. W. Pollard having written an introduction, and supplied side-notes throughout the plays. In this introduction an effort has been made to arrive at some general conclusions as regards the authorship of the plays from the internal evidence of metre, style, and other characteristics. But the question of the dialectal peculiarities of the language is quite ignored, and nothing has been added to the remarks of the Surtees Society's editor upon the question of the locality to which these plays belong.

It will be sufficient for the present purpose to say, with reference to the former of these questions, that the dialect used in the plays is that of the North of England, called the Northumbrian or Northern dialect, which was spoken in that part of the country which lies to the north of the Humber, and to the east of the Pennine Chain; there are, however, a few forms from the Midland dialect interspersed here and there, and in the thirteenth play a "Southern tooth" is adopted for a definite purpose for a few lines only.

As to the latter question—that of the locality to which the plays belong—it is the object of this paper to deal with it so far as to supply some substantial grounds for believing that the plays belong not to "Widkirk," as has generally been supposed, but to the city of Wakefield itself.

TOWNELEY MYSTERIES OR TOWNELEY PLAYS. As was stated above, the Surtees Society adopted the title of "The Towneley Mysteries" when publishing its edition of the plays in question; and the Early English Text Society has brought out its edition under the name of "The Towneley Plays." The justification for these titles lies in the fact that the manuscript volume, in which the plays are contained, is supposed to have been for some centuries in the possession of the Towneley family before it was sold in 1814, though it is not known how or when such possession was acquired. But it would have been more in accordance with the analogy of the custom adopted in connexion with the great classical authors, to speak of the Towneley Manuscript of the Plays, and to name the plays themselves after the place where they were acted. Thus we speak of the Chester, Coventry, and York Plays.

WIDKIRK PLAYS. When the Towneley Library was dispersed in 1814, Mr. Douce annotated the catalogue of manuscripts at the request of the owners, and of the volume containing the Mystery Plays he wrote that it formerly "belonged to the Abbey of Widkirk, near Wakefield, in the county of York," according to a tradition which he said was then current in the Towneley family. But eight years later, when supplying an introduction to the play published by Mr. Peregrine Edward Towneley for the Roxburgh Club, Mr. Douce relinquished this position altogether, and expressed his opinion that the manuscript had formerly belonged to the Abbey of Whalley in Lancashire, and had passed into the hands of the Towneleys at the dissolution of religious houses in Henry VIII.'s reign. It may therefore be fairly asserted that, in default of evidence to support either of these views, Mr. Douce's opinion is not one that carries conviction; and although the Surtees Society's editor says that Mr. Douce "appears to have subsequently considered as not worthy of much regard" the tradition assigning these plays to Widkirk, seeing that he abandoned it in favour of the Whalley tradition, yet the editor at the same time declares that "the supposition that this book belonged to the Abbey of Widkirk, near Wakefield, has upon it remarkably the characteristics of a genuine tradition." Accordingly he has built up an argument which not only rests on no real foundation, but is also in contradiction to the plain indications given by the text itself, and to certain facts hereafter to be mentioned; and in consequence of this argument of the Surtees Society's editor, these plays have frequently been called "The Widkirk (or Woodkirk) Plays," a title which appears both unjustifiable and misleading.

There is no place of the name of Widkirk in the neighbourhood of Wakefield, nor indeed in any part of the district to which the dialect of these plays seems to point. But some four or five miles north-west of Wakefield there is a village called Woodkirk, or West Ardsley, where a religious establishment (not an Abbey, as Mr. Douce asserted, but a cell of Augustinian or Black Canons) was founded by the Earls Warren early in the 12th century, and placed under the control of the Priory of S. Oswald at Nostell, which is some five miles south of Wakefield.¹ It was therefore taken for granted that at the fairs held under charter of Henry I. at Woodkirk, on the feasts of the Assumption and Nativity of the Blessed Virgin (Aug. 15th and Sept. 8th respectively), dramatic representations of Mystery Plays were given for the delectation and instruction of the visitors,² and a local antiquary has gone so far as to state that the plays were probably written in "Woodkirk Monastery," and acted in the Church which still exists there.³ Finally, in the "Athenæum" of December 2nd, 1893, Professor Skeat has shown that there is no philological difficulty in assuming that Widkirk and Woodkirk are simply varieties of the same name. A diligent search has, however, revealed to the writer no trace of the former pronunciation. The name does not seem to occur in either form, either in Domesday Book or in Kirkby's Inquest (about 1277), but the following spellings in various documents have been discovered:—Wudechirche (1202), Wodekirk (1293), Wodkirk (1379), Wodkyrc (1379), Woodkirk (1490), Wodkyrke (1546), Woodkirke (1595), and Woodchurch (1623, 1642, 1716, 1756, 1765, &c.).¹ There is, moreover, at the present time no knowledge of any pronunciation like Widkirk in the locality itself, where Woodkirk and Woodchurch are apparently used indifferently.

It is curious that there is a Whitkirk some four miles to the east of Leeds, and about eight miles north-east of Wakefield.² But as no abbey or other monastic building is known to have existed there, no attempt need be made to connect the plays with it. There was, however, a settlement of Knights Templars in the parish of Whitkirk, and soon after 1181 a preceptory was founded there at a place called, in Domesday Book, Newhusum, and now Temple-Newsam.

WAKEFIELD PLAYS. The following considerations seem to render it extremely probable, if not quite certain, that the ancient city of Wakefield itself was the place at which the so-called Towneley Plays were represented.

(1) Wakefield and its trade guilds are mentioned more than once in the original manuscript. At the commencement of the first play (on the "Creation") we find the entry:—

In dei nomine amen.
Assit Principio, Sancta Maria, Meo. Wakefeld.

And in the margin is inserted the word "Barkers," referring, undoubtedly, to the guild of tanners who undertook the performance of this particular play;³ the same guild took the corresponding play at York, as we learn from Miss Toulmin Smith. The second play (on the "Killing of Abel") has a marginal entry at the commencement:—

Glover Pag

the imperfect word being part of the word Pageant, or its mediæval Latin equivalent, Pagina or Pagonna; the Gaunters (or Glovers) took

² As Woodkirk probably meant "wooden church," so Whitkirk probably means "white church," i.e. church of stone, according to Mr. Whitaker in Loidis and Elmete, p. 137.

³ It is hardly necessary to point out that the performance of religious plays was the special province of the trade-guilds.

the corresponding play in the York series. The third play is entitled Processus Noe cum filiis. Wakefeld.

"Processus" being practically equivalent to "Pagina." The eighth play (on "Pharaoh") has a marginal note:—

Litsters Pagonn,

referring to the ancient guild of dyers at Wakefield; the "Lytsteres" at York took the play entitled "The Trial before Herod." The twenty-seventh play (on "The Pilgrims," or disciples journeying to Emmaus) has a similar entry:—

fysher pagent.

It is unfortunate that historical records of these Wakefield trade guilds are no longer discoverable, but there is every reason to suppose that the craftsmen of Wakefield took care to form themselves, as those of other towns did, into societies for the protection of their rights, as is indeed asserted by these entries which have been quoted. Mr. Pollard's jesting remark¹ that the Fishers of Wakefield "may have lent a hand at play-acting for the lack of sufficient employment in an inland town" is hardly convincing. In Leland's time, the market at Wakefield appears to have had a constant supply of river fish.²

(2) In the second play (on the "Killing of Abel"), Cain is made by the author to ask the following favour, when he has heard God pronounce his doom:—

Syn I haue done so mekill syn, that I may not thi mercy wyn,
And thou thus dos me from thi grace,
I shall hyde me fro thi face:
And where so any man may fynd me,
Let hym slo me hardely:
And where so any man may me meyte,
Ayther bi sty, or yit bi strete:
And hardely, when I am dede, bery me in gudeboure at the quarell hede.

Here we have so plain a reference to Wakefield that it is surprising to find no explanation of it in the edition of the Surtees Society, or in the more recent one of the Early English Text Society. Among the benefactions to Wakefield Grammar School³ is one dated Oct. 3rd, 1594, by George Savile, of Wakefield, one of the founders of the School, and therein occur the following words:—

Omnibus Christi fidelibus ad quos hoc præsens scriptum pervenerit, Georgius Savile de Wakefeld in comitatu Eboracensi generosus Salutem in Domino sempiternam. Noveritis me præfatum Georgium pro diversis bonis causis et considerationibus me ad hoc specialiter moventibus dedisse concessisse feoffasse et hoc præsentī scripto meo confirmasse Gubernatoribus Scholæ Liberæ Reginæ Elizabethæ apud Wakefeld in comitatu Eboracensi et successoribus suis unam parvam clausuram cum edificiis superedificatis jaentem prope le Goodyboure inter le Goodyboure Lane ex orientali et quandam croftam Henrici Grice armigeri ex occidentali proviso semper quod mihi licebit præfato Georgio Savile et heredibus meis per spatium decem annorum proxime sequentium terram et fundum prædictæ clausuræ sive alicujus inde parcelli non superedificati effodere et lapidicinas facere pro lapidibus perquirendis ad usum nostrum proprium et non aliter.

This Goodybower must have been a well-known feature of the town of Wakefield, and it is clear from the deed just quoted that there was abundance of stone in or near it. As a matter of fact the Grammar School was built in Goodybower Close, given by George Savile under the deed just quoted, and the stone for it came from the quarries on the spot. It is also highly probable that the same quarries furnished much of the stone from which the ancient Cathedral, Chapel on the Bridge, and Rectory House, were built. A quarry is also said to have existed near the Grammar School until quite recent times, having been probably filled up when the present Borough Market was made. A reference to Goodybower and its quarry—"quarell" being the local pronunciation—could not fail to rouse the interest of the audience, if that audience was a Wakefield one: and this seems to be implied by the mention of Goodybower alone, without the name of the town. Moreover, the very name of Goodybower appears also to indicate that it was the actual place where the Mysteries were performed, and no more fitting place in Wakefield could have been found: within a stone's throw of the Cathedral, it was, up to the 17th century, surrounded by fields and gardens, and would exactly correspond to the meadows close to the towns, where many cycles of Mystery Plays were represented. In the earliest times there is no doubt that the Churches were used for these representations; but when the crowds began to get too large for the Church, the Church-yard was employed, and a stage erected in it at a point which allowed a good view from the village or town street; and later still, to provide for greater numbers of sightseers, and to better preserve the sanctity of the Church and its surroundings, a stage was erected in a meadow near the town (as is indeed now done at Ober-Ammergau), or a movable one was drawn round the town on wheels, and different plays acted upon it at different points of vantage: this latter custom seems to have been observed both at Chester and at York.

(3) In the thirteenth play (the second part of "The Shepherds"), which is perhaps the strongest and most original of the whole series, the first shepherd says:—

I haue soght with my dogys
All horbery shrogys,
And of fefteyn hogys,
Fond I bot oone ewe.

Horbury is a town three miles south-west of Wakefield, and "shroggs" is a local term for rough moorland on which thorns and brushwood are plentiful. These facts have been duly pointed out by the Surtees Society's editor, and repeated by others. But we may add that Horbury, in the fifteenth century, was a chapelry of Wakefield; and there is every reason to suppose that the priests would deem it part of their duty to insist upon those under their charge attending the periodical performances of Mystery Plays, since these were specially written and acted to instruct the unlettered in the Bible story. More particularly would this be insisted on if the mysteries were performed in connection with the mother church at Wakefield; in that case, Horbury, being so close at hand, and as it were a suburb of Wakefield, would supply a large contingent of spectators at the representations of the plays, who would duly appreciate this special reference to their native place. It is also deserving of mention that Wakefield was a far more convenient centre for Horbury folk than Woodkirk could possibly have been; and therefore, if there were any representations of mysteries at Woodkirk, the Horbury spectators would be fewer in number, and the reason for introducing a mention of their town would be less obvious.

(4) In the same thirteenth play in which reference is made to Horbury, the shepherds are represented as agreeing to meet at a late hour on Christmas Eve at "the crokyd thorn." The Surtees Society's editor imagines this to be a certain "Shepherd's Thorn" in the parish of Mapplewell, which is quite close to Barnsley, and some ten miles away from Horbury, where the shepherds are supposed to be at the time, a distance far too great to be accomplished with a flock of sheep on a wintry night, when the weather is particularly described as "cold, spitus, and kene."

Mr. Pollard repeats this explanation without comment. But when we remember that the two adjacent parishes to Horbury are Thornhill on the west, and Thornes on the east (between Horbury and Wakefield, and indeed almost a part of Wakefield), it is surely not necessary to travel any further in search of "the crokyd thorn." This argument thus supplies us with another reason for connecting the plays with Wakefield, to whose inhabitants the crooked thorn was doubtless well known.

(5) In the twenty-fourth play, which deals with the quarrelling of the soldiers about Christ's clothes during the crucifixion, we find these expressions:—

- (a) I haue ron full fast in hy Hedir to this towne.
- (b) For he commes, shrewes, vnto this towne.
- (c) I am the most shrew in all myn kyn,
That is from this towne unto lyn.

From these passages it is clear that the plays were performed in a town, and Woodkirk was no town, but a small village; and also clear that Lynn was a considerable distance from it. Both of these conditions are quite well satisfied, under the supposition that Wakefield was the scene of the representation of the Mysteries.

(6) In addition to the internal evidence derived from the plays themselves, we have other indications from external sources which point in the same direction as those which have been adduced. There is some evidence that a body of players existed in Wakefield, and none that any existed in Woodkirk. Miss Toulmin Smith, in her exhaustive introduction to the York Plays (p. xxxvii), informs us that the "players of Wakefield" visited York in the year 1446, and quotes an entry from an old Account Book belonging to the Corporation of the city of York, which shows that one player at least was paid for his assistance in the performances of the Mysteries there. An interesting fact bearing on this point deserves a passing mention here: five of the so-called Towneley Plays are almost identical with five of the York Plays, and it is doubtless these five which the Wakefield players represented at York; but the full meaning of this identity cannot fitly be discussed here.

(7) From time immemorial Wakefield has been constantly described as "merry Wakefield," and the reason for this epithet has been found in various facts, according to the sympathies of the various writers who have dealt with the question. But it would be difficult to select a word more fitted to represent the condition and appearance of any town where Mystery Plays were habitually acted. Judging from analogy, we may be sure that the plays were acted for several days in succession, and that the crowds of people who came to see them would require the hostelries of a large town to accommodate them, and these would be doubtless both numerous and good in Wakefield during the 15th century, when it was probably as large a town as any in the West Riding. Contemporaneous writers have left us descriptions of the appearance of the towns during these festivities: extraordinary interest was aroused in the Mystery Plays long before the days of performance, and when these came, vast crowds of people poured into the town in the early morning, for the representations usually began about eight o'clock: a procession paraded the streets before the commencement of the plays, headed by trumpeters and heralds, and accompanied by bow-men and other men of arms to keep order; the priests who superintended the representations, and the actors in their appropriate dresses, were in the procession; and the rear was closed by a crowd of citizens, merchants, and other visitors, on foot or on horseback.¹ Meanwhile, at the place of representation was gathered "the motley crowd of mediæval days: monks, palmers, merchants in their various costumes, servants of noble families, with badges on their shoulders, hawkers of pardons and relics, pedlars, artificers, grooms, foresters, hinds from the farm, and shepherds from the fells: all known by special qualities of dress and bearing. Comely women, like Chaucer's Wife of Bath, made it their business to be present at some favourable point of view. The windows and the wooden galleries were hung with carpets. Girls leaned from latticed casements, and old men bent upon their crutches in the doorways. In these circumstances it is not to be wondered at that Whitsuntide or Easter, when the Miracles were played, became a season of debauch and merry-making."² This even assumed such a vigorous character as to frequently call forth the denunciations of the clergy from the pulpits. One fourteenth-century preacher declares, "To gather men together to buy their victuals the dearer, and to stir men to gluttony, and to pride and boast, they play these Miracles, and to hold fellowship of gluttony and lechery in such days of Miracles playing and so this playing of Miracles nowadays is very witness of hideous covetousness."³ No wonder then that Wakefield should obtain a reputation for merriment if it was the scene of the representation of Mysteries.⁴

⁴ Mr. J. W. Walker writes:—"With regard to the place-name 'Wakefield' itself, there can be no doubt that the word is derived from two Anglo-Saxon words, wacu, a vigil, a derivative of the Anglo-Saxon verb wacan, to be on the look out; and feld, a field, or clearing in the forest. Thus the place-name Wakefield means a field where 'wakes,' i.e. vigil feasts were held. The wake is one of the oldest of our festivals, and was held on the festival of the patron saint of the church; it is so called because on the previous night or vigil,

(8) It remains to be added that as there were trade guilds in Wakefield ready to bear the expense, and a body of actors capable of representing Mystery Plays, so there were also Chantry Priests available to supervise the acting, and re-edit the plays from time to time: for it seems to have been the universal custom, and properly so, for the clergy to have the control in these matters. Mr. J. W. Walker informs me that in the 15th century there were no fewer than nine priests connected with the Chantries of the Parish Church of Wakefield, in addition to the vicar, as well as five others connected with the four chapels in the town, and others attached to the Chantries in the immediate neighbourhood. There was therefore no apparent necessity for any extraneous help from the religious brethren at the Woodkirk cell, though it is quite possible that such help was given, even if the plays were acted at Wakefield.¹ In any case it is quite certain that the most original parts of the plays were written by a man of great dramatic ability, of boisterous humour, of conspicuous freedom of speech, of daring invention, and possessed of an accurate perception of what would be to the taste of a West Riding audience in the rough days of the 15th century. This is, however, a topic which does not fall within the scope of this paper, which has merely been written to substantiate the justice of the claim, that the Mystery Plays, hitherto known as Towneley or Widkirk Plays, shall for the future be called "Wakefield Plays."

the people used to watch or 'wake' in the church till the morning dawned. The name seems to point to the existence of a church, or at least of a cross and preaching station, even before the town existed. Thus the place became a religious centre, and the natural home for these plays."

NOTES ON YORKSHIRE CHURCHES.

ST. MARY, CAMPSALL.

Jan. 28, 1856.—An interesting church of good dimensions, comprising nave with aisles, north and south transepts and chancel, with a Norman tower engaged at the west end of the nave. The tower is a good specimen of enriched Norman work, and there are some traces of Norman in the north transept. The chancel is Early English, the nave Decorated and Perpendicular, with some earlier indications of Norman.

The nave has on each side an arcade of three pointed arches, which seem to be transitional from Decorated to Perpendicular. The piers are octagonal, the alternate faces being slightly projected, the capitals octagonal and moulded. The clerestory is from Perpendicular, with a battlement and windows of three lights of later character. The aisles are Perpendicular, the north aisle narrower than the southern. The tower is rather small in its dimensions, entirely Norman, except a Perpendicular addition of a battlement and four crocketed pinnacles. It opens to the nave and aisles by plain round arches upon imposts; the west ends of the aisles being cut off from the church and applied to the reception of rubbish. On one of the north piers is a shield. On the west side of the tower is a very fine Norman doorway, with four ranges of excellent mouldings, exhibiting the chevron and other ornaments, and shafts of which some of the capitals have perished. Over the door is an arcade with chevron ornaments and shafts, the central arch being the loftiest. The belfry story has two Norman windows on each side, each sub-divided by a shaft, and the arches springing also from shafts. Between the two windows is a smaller single window. There is a flattened trefoil window at the west end of the south aisle, which is finished by a later battlement and is carried up two stories, in a late debased style, perhaps of the same age as the clerestory. There is here a chamber in the upper story, added for some purpose. The transepts are rather shallow, and open to the nave by Early English arches, which have chevron and other mouldings almost Norman; the capitals of the shafts are well sculptured. There is an odd arcade against the end wall of the south transept, being a range of flattened trefoil arches on corbels. There is a pointed arch between the south transept and the south aisle, but between the north transept and the north aisle is an enriched Norman arch, the soffit filled with lozenges and chevrons in the imposts. There is a square aperture through the pier. In the east wall of the south transept is a sepulchral recess hidden by a pew. There is one Norman window at the north end of the transept, seen only externally, and replaced by a Decorated one of two lights. In the south transept is a long Decorated window of three lights. The chancel arch is Early English, springing from shafts of early character with moulded square abaci. One window on the north of the chancel has flowers on the jamb, just at the spring of the arch. The chancel is spacious, but the walls lean rather frightfully. There is a good rood screen of Perpendicular character, with groining and four plain arches on each side of the door, not highly ornamented. The chancel has a wretched flat ceiling and a debased east window of square form with transom. On the north side appears one Norman window with mouldings and shafts. The other windows are Transitional from Early English to Decorated, of two lights without foils, and some of them are closed. On the south of the sacarium are two Early English sedilia with trefoil heads, somewhat mutilated. There is a stone seat running along both the north and side of the chancel, having good chamfered elbow ends. There is an arched recess in the south beneath a window.

The font has a plain octagonal bowl on stem of like form. The parapets of the aisles are moulded—there are none to the transepts, and the chancel has a flagged roof. The south porch is wholly of stone, the roof having strong arched ribs. The inner doorway has a flattened trefoil arch (rather domestic in form) under a square door-case, the whole within moulded pointed arch with flowered mouldings. Over it is a niche. The tower is too small in proportion to the size of the church.

The church is in decent order, with regular pews, and a barrel organ in a west gallery, but no really good improvement has been effected.

ST. MARTIN, WOMERSLEY.

Jan. 28, 1856.—A large church, with several interesting features. The plan comprises a nave with north and south aisles, north and south transepts, a chancel, and a tower and spire in the centre, so that the arrangement is cruciform. The south aisle is only continued along part of the nave. The prevailing features are Decorated and Perpendicular. The north aisle is narrow, with a lean-to roof. The south aisle is wide. The north arcade seems to be Early English, and has five low-pointed arches, of which the most eastern is very small and narrow. The western pier is square, two others are circular, and another composed of a half octagon and a half circular column set against each other. There are only two arches between the south aisle and the nave, which are pointed with octagonal pier having moulded capitals. The clerestory on the south side has Decorated windows of two lights. On the north it occupies a much larger space of wall from the lowness of the arcade, and has one long Perpendicular window of two lights, and two square-headed Decorated ones of two lights. The north transept has only a lean-to roof. On the north are several Decorated windows of two lights, both square and pointed. In the north transept, on the east side, a square-headed one of three lights, and Perpendicular. The west window of the nave is Perpendicular of four lights, lately restored; below it, a labelled doorway, the door having good new iron-work.

The Chancel is modern and bad. There is an ugly Venetian window in the south transept, the parapet of which has good mouldings and a niche in the gable. At the east end of the south aisle is a Perpendicular niche, and indication of an altar by the side of the tower arch. The tower rises on four pointed arches, upon clustered octagonal shafts of good bold character. The transepts do not reach beyond the wall of the aisles, and have flat arches opening into the aisles. The font has an octagonal bowl, moulded below, upon an octagonal stem. The tower is Decorated, plain, and good, with a plain parapet, and two light belfry windows. Upon it is an octagonal spire, without ribs, and spire lights above and below. The south porch is entirely of stone, with arched ribs and flagged roof: both doorways good and well moulded, the outer one very lofty. On this door is the inscription:—

PRIES PVR LALME DE S.

There is a sepulchral arch under the window of the north transept, and an effigy set up against the wall of the chancel.

ALL SAINTS', ARKSEY.

Jan. 28th, 1856.—A large church, cruciform in plan, with a central tower. The nave and chancel each have north and south aisles, but the transepts do not extend beyond the wall of the aisle. There are portions of various pointed styles, but a considerable portion of Early English and Perpendicular. The tower and the arcades of the nave are chiefly of this style. The nave has each arcade of three pointed arches. Those on the north spring from circular columns, with octagonal capitals. Those on the south have octagonal columns, and are of less good work, probably later. There is no clerestory. At the south-west corner of the aisle is a large staircase of octagonal form, lighted by loops. In the south aisle the windows are chiefly Perpendicular, of three lights. The west window has three cinquefoiled lights, without tracery, under a pointed arch, and contains a little stained glass. The west window of the north aisle is Perpendicular and mutilated. The other windows of the north aisle, square-headed, of Decorated character, of two and three lights, containing much stained glass with armorial shields. Between the north aisle and the transept is a Norman arch on square imposts, and over it a window of the same kind, now closed. The corresponding arch on the south is pointed, but plain. The roofs are plain. The tower stands on four Early English pointed arches, with good mouldings. The western arch is the best, but is on plain square imposts. The eastern piers are clustered, with plain round moulded capitals. There is a double ascent to the chancel, which seems to have an inclination. There is a late thin Perpendicular rood screen at the entrance to the chancel, and very late parclose screens. Between the north transept and the chancel arch is a pointed arch on imposts. The north (side of the) chancel has a late square-headed window, and at the east end a mutilated window. The chancel opens to each aisle or chapel by a continuous pointed arch, and extends beyond the north aisles, and at the east end of the southern (aisle), a vestry is added, which extends actually beyond the east end of the chancel. The east window is poor, Perpendicular, of three lights. On the south of the altar is a good trefoil-headed piscina, with good mouldings continued all round: the drain square and apparently altered. There is a quatrefoil pierced in the wall between the chancel and vestry, which is said to be modern. The font has a plain round bowl, and a cover of Jacobean woodwork. The pulpit is also Jacobean. The external character of the church, except the tower, is chiefly Perpendicular, embattled, with pinnacles, except in the transept; the north aisle has no pinnacles. At the west end the parapets of the aisle are not completed. There is a good south porch, embattled, the outer door having a crocketed arch with finial and shafts. The arch, Tudor form, with enriched spandrels. There is a very large gargoyle on the north aisle of the chancel. The vestry is of late character. The tower is Early English, large and massive. The belfry window has two plain lancets with shaft, having impost set under an obtuse hood. In the stage below is an obtuse window of early character. The tower is embattled, with four pinnacles, and has a short octagonal stone spire without ribs, and alternate spire lights. This upper part is of course a later addition.

ST. HELEN, MAR.

Jan. 18, 1860.—This church has a nave, south aisle, chancel, south porch, and western tower, with stone spire. The nave is small, and divided from the aisle by two pointed arches upon an octagonal pillar, over the capital of which is the vestige of a niche with statue. The windows of the nave are some Decorated and some Perpendicular, mostly square-headed. The chancel arch is pointed, on octagonal columns. Both chancel and nave have flat modern ceiling. The nave is much confined and choked up with pews and gallery, in which latter is a small barrel organ. There is also a hideous stove. The chancel has on the south a trefoiled lancet and a double lancet window. The east window, Perpendicular, of three trefoiled lights. There is on the south a trefoil-arched piscina, with quatrefoil orifice, also a Priest's door. There is an ancient slab with the print of a cross. Within the sacarium is a brass of John Lewis, "nuper de Man," Recorder of Doncaster, in the 31st year of Elizabeth, in the dress of the age. The font is odd: the bowl octagonal, bulging outwards, on a square stem, having shafts at the angles, set in hollow and wedge-like blocks. The tower is in its lower part Early English. The tower arch of that character with good mouldings, on circular shafts. The tower is remarkable for having an arched recess in its north and south wall, though there is no apparent reason for this; but there is a slope-roofed projection on the south side corresponding with the arch. The lower part of the tower has a double lancet window and a slit opening, angular buttresses at the west, and no doorway. The battlement and four crocketed pinnacles, and also the spire, are Perpendicular. The spire is octagonal and without ribs. The porch is a good specimen of a kind not unfrequent in this part of Yorkshire, having a high-pitched stone roof covered with flags, and vaulted within with strong stone ribs.

The roof of the nave is covered with stone flags carried continuously over the aisle.

ST. DENIS, HICKLETON.¹

Jan. 18, 1860.—This church has a nave with north aisle and short south aisle, and chancel with south aisle, western tower and south porch, principally Perpendicular. The south side has a fine battlement with crocketed pinnacles of good execution, and large square-headed windows of four lights. The south porch, like others in the vicinity, has a stone arched roof with strong ribs, and is situated at the west of the south aisle. The north aisle has a lean-to tilled roof. The south aisle eastward of the porch is rather a chapel, and opens to the nave by only one wide large arch on panelled corbels. The arcade on the north is of two large pointed arches with octagonal pier, having a plain capital. The chancel arch is Norman with chevron and studded mouldings, on imposts having a kind of net ornament. The chancel is divided from the south aisle, which is continued along it, by two wide arches with octagonal column having a clumsy capital. There is a lancet on the north side of the chancel, the east window Decorated, of three lights and square headed. The south aisle externally is uninterrupted and all of a piece, but there is within an arch of division between the eastern and western portion. The eastern respond has a panelled capital. There is a priest's door of late Tudor form. The tower arch is plain and closed up by a gallery. In the north aisle wall is seen the base of what appears an early pillar. The font is early, the bowl circular, with Early English flowered moulding round the upper part.

The tower is Perpendicular of late character, has a battlement and four pinnacles, two strings, a debased belfry window, and west window of three lights also debased, and corner buttresses.

The interior is gloomy and blocked up by pews, and there is no trace of any improvement.

ST. ANDREW, GRINTON.

Jan. 19, 1856.—A large church, consisting of a nave and chancel, each with aisles, and a western tower, chiefly of plain Perpendicular character. The nave has on each side an arcade of four pointed arches. The chancel has two which are smaller and narrower. The piers all octagonal, with capitals. There is a clerestory to the nave which has square-headed windows, but only on the north side. The chancel arch is pointed; there is a rood-screen and parclose screens of wood. The chancel extends beyond the aisles, and there is an oblique passage into the sacristy on the north. On the south of the altar is a piscina, and there are traces of sedilia. At the east end of the south aisle is an enclosed seat. Some windows are of three lights merely trefoiled. The east window is Perpendicular, of five lights, and contains fragments of stained glass, amongst which may be seen the word "Maria." The windows are chiefly square-headed, late and poor. The font has a cylindrical bowl, covered with transverse line mouldings, upon a short stem. It has a wood cover of late character. Within the south porch is a fine Perpendicular doorway. The parapet of the south aisle is embattled, but not the north. The tower is embattled and plain Perpendicular.

ST. GILES, BOWES.

Jan. 18th, 1856.—This church is of rude appearance, but cruciform in plan, without aisles, with a long chancel, south porch and plain belfry over the west end, with two open pointed arches for bells. There is a plain Norman doorway on the north side. The outer door of the south porch has fine mouldings, and over it is a niche containing a crucifix. There are pointed arches to the chancel and transepts. The parapets have plain mouldings, the windows of the transepts square-headed and very plain. The chancel has a Perpendicular east window; its other windows late, and square-headed, and not good. There is a sedile and a piscina on the south side.

ST. MARY, CARLETON (IN CRAVEN).

June 10th, 1856.—This church has a nave and chancel with south aisle to both—and a north aisle added to the nave in 1852—a west tower and south porch. The whole appears to be late Perpendicular except the door within the south porch, which seems to be late Norman verging to Early English, with semi-circular arch and capitals of shafts. The south arcade is irregular, three arches are in the nave, and two in the chancel, of the former two are pointed and of small size, and the western one wider and loftier, but all rather low, the columns octagonal, with capitals. The two arches in the chancel are quite obtuse, almost elliptical in shape, but with piers as the others. There is no chancel arch, or architectural division marking the chancel. The north aisle has three regular pointed arches with octagonal piers, of better kind than the older ones. The south aisle is but narrow. The windows are late and square-headed, of two and three lights, some foliated. The southern windows have the internal opening shouldered, a fashion common in this district. The roof is of cradle form, and open. The tower arch pointed. There is a square opening for a piscina on the south side of the chancel. To the south of the tower is an original vestry. The church is pueed, except the new north aisle, in which are open seats and an organ. The tower is plain, embattled on the south and west, but with plain parapet on the north and east, and has four small crocketed pinnacles, corner buttresses, a west window of three lights, and large belfry windows, also of three lights. On the south side of the tower is a plain niche. The font has an early cylindrical bowl, on a circular stem.

BOLTON ABBEY.

June 10, 1856.—Of this celebrated ecclesiastical edifice, the present remains consist of the abbey church, of which the nave is in good repair and used as the parish church, but the choir and transepts are in ruins. The nave is Early English and has a north aisle and clerestory. Its original west end and also that of the aisle present fine tiers of Early English arches with good mouldings, toothed ornament and shafts; some at the west of the nave are trefoiled, and there is a fine deeply moulded doorway. In the aisle front the upper arches are the smallest. The front of the nave is curiously marked by the beginning of a large tower of late Perpendicular character, left unfinished at the time of the Dissolution, which has very large projecting buttresses with ogee canopies and figures of dogs sedant on panelled pedestals; also a large west window and doorway which has fine mouldings, and an ogee arch and panelling covering all the space above it. The tower bears on its west front an inscription recording its erection in 1520 by Prior Moone. The nave is lofty; the arcade dividing it is of four large Early English arches, with massive octagonal piers which have moulded capitals with toothed ornament. Above a clerestory of Early English lancet windows, which have externally a toothed cornice over them and an embattled parapet of later date. The aisle has no parapet. The abbey buildings were all on the south. On the south of the nave the cloisters once existed, and above the space they occupied is a series of tall Decorated windows of two lights, with transoms and set in pairs, a passage or gallery running through them communicating from one jamb to another. These windows are now filled with good stained glass, the gift of the Duke of Devonshire. Two Perpendicular windows have been inserted in the wall at the east of the nave forming the present church. The roof is Perpendicular, of flat pitch, panelled, with tracery above the beams and angels bearing shields. The corbels supporting the timbers of the roof represent heads, one with serpent in the mouth. There is a wood screen enclosing what forms the present chancel. The east of the aisle is also enclosed by a screen, and has a raised platform for an altar; also a piscina and an altar stone. In the chancel is a piscina with a rose on the orifice. There is another obtuse piscina in the nave and a stone bench.

There was once a central tower, of which the four large arches may be seen with clustered piers of Early English character, early in the style, the capitals of the shafts emerging from Norman. The transepts and choir are chiefly Decorated, the transepts having as usual an eastern aisle. The choir is without aisles. There are two pointed arches dividing each transept from its aisle, upon octagonal columns of large size. The windows of the choir, five on each side, are large and lofty, having traces of late flowing Decorated character. The east window, very large, but entirely mutilated. On each side is a fine range of interesting arches occupying the lower part under the windows, marking the lower part, at least of the walls, as Early English. These are in two divisions, and the eastern division presents indications of later alterations. The sedilia must have been important, but are quite destroyed; on the lower part may be seen wavy lines, marking Decorated work. One of the southern windows of the choir has its tracery of three lights perfect. The intersecting arches, north and south of the choir, were the monks' stalls, and are in two divisions, for different ranks of monks. The nave was spared when the abbey was dissolved in 1542.

June 10, 1858.—The nave of the abbey church forms the present parochial church, having been saved when the rest of the abbey was destroyed at the Dissolution. The church originally was stately and beautiful, cruciform in plan, having nave with north aisle, north and south transepts, choir without aisles, a central tower at the crossing, and another at the west end was begun in 1520 but never completed. The nave is chiefly Early English and the arches under the central tower, but the choir and transepts are Decorated. The west tower late Perpendicular, erected against the ornamental Early English west front, which still remains perfect. The nave is divided from its aisle by four large pointed arches, springing from massive piers, alternately circular and octagonal, and having toothed mouldings in the capitals. Over them is a clerestory with single lancet windows, over which externally is a toothed-string course. The north aisle has also lancet windows, and parapet with corbel-table of the same character. The clerestory has a battlement added, and a corbel-table below it. The nave is lofty and grand, but the roof of low pitch, though of fair character, with panelling and angel figures under the beams. It is of Perpendicular character, perhaps coeval with the west tower. The nave has on the south six long early Decorated windows, set in pairs, each of two lights, with transom, and all lately filled with very good new stained glass. In the jambs of these runs a passage, communicating from one to the other, and the windows are set high above the cloisters, which were on this side, but now destroyed. There remains, however, on the outside of the south wall, below the windows, a pretty Early English arcade. There is a Perpendicular wood screen dividing the east end of the nave which now forms the chancel, and an east window of like character. The west window is an equal triplet. The east end of the aisle is raised and has a piscina, also an altar stone on which four crosses are distinctly seen. The piscina of the choir has been moved to this part, and has a rose over the orifice. The church is pueed, and has a gallery with small organ. The west front is much ornamented with Early English arcades, vesica, etc., with mouldings and shafts, also a beautiful deeply moulded doorway. The west end of the aisle has also two ranges of arcades, and a triple window with toothed mouldings. The west tower, if finished, would have been large and imposing; it has grand projecting buttresses, with ogee canopies and figures of dogs sedant on the set-offs. On the west side, a large window with transom and ogee canopy, the moulding being continuous, and much ornamental panelling about it, and an inscription in Latin, giving the date 1520 to its erection by Prior Moone. It probably never was finished before the Dissolution in 1540.

The choir is much ruined, and has five large Decorated windows on each side, which have mostly lost their tracery, but in some it remains, especially one on the south which has a Flamboyant character. The east window is very large. Below them is a range of intersecting arches, with a break, so as to form two separate divisions, which seem to have formed the monks' stalls. The sedilia on the south of the altar seem to have been four, now much mutilated. The central tower rose upon four large arches, which sprung from shafts with plain early capitals. There seem to have been chantries north and south of the choir. The transepts had each an eastern aisle divided by two pointed arches with octagonal pillars. The windows were all Decorated.

None of the conventual buildings remain, except the gateway, now incorporated into the Hall, built on the west side of the Abbey. The conventual buildings were on the south.

ST. WILFRID, BURNSALL.

June 10, 1856.—A plain church, much of the local character, for the most part plain and rather coarse Perpendicular, comprising nave, chancel, and north and south aisles, west tower engaged with the aisles, and south porch. The east end extremity is very ungraceful, being one wide gable which presents in the centre a poor late window, and on each side a smaller one of two lights, terminating the aisles, which are co-extensive with the chancel. Of these, the southern is Decorated, but poor; the northern, square-headed, of two lights. There is another small Decorated window to the south of the chancel, and at the east angles rather poor pinnacles. The other windows throughout the church are square-headed, some without foils. The arcades of the nave beyond the tower have on each side three pointed arches, with coarse octagonal columns having capitals. The nave has a clerestory, embattled externally, with poor windows. The chancel arcades are lower than those of the nave, but somewhat similar, and of two bays. The tower opens on the north and south to the aisles by plain pointed arches in the wall. There are several open benches, a gallery, and an organ. The tower is embattled, and has corner pinnacles and buttresses. On the west side a three-light window; those of the belfry of two lights. The aisles have moulded parapets and corner pinnacles of a rough kind. The font has an early character. On a square base is various sculpture and scrollwork. The chancel arch still remains. The porch has the date 1612 of a re-edification. The churchyard is entered by a lych-gate. The surrounding scenery very beautiful.

ST. MICHAEL, LINTON.

June 10, 1856.—A church of clumsy outline, being long and low, and without a tower. It has the aisles continued along both nave and chancel, quite to the east; and over the west end is a small stone bell turret, pointed at top, and having open arches for two bells. There is an original corbel-table under the turret. The west window is of three lights, rather Flamboyant in character; those at the west of the aisles small and poor, of two lights. The windows of the aisles of the nave are all square-headed, of two lights: some appear to be Decorated, and of fair character, presenting internally a kind of shouldered form. Others on the north are of later and inferior sort. In the chancel are some square-headed windows of three lights, labelled, without foils. At the east end of the north aisle is a square-headed window of three lights, of decided Decorated character. The arcades of the nave have each four plain pointed arches, with octagonal pillars having capitals, but the two western arches on the north are smaller than the rest. The clerestory is embattled. The chancel arch springs upon imposts, as also those dividing the east and west portions of the aisles. The chancel is of two bays, with arches as those of the nave. The north arcade of the nave is not exactly similar to the southern, for its two western arches are pointed and very small, then follows a break with a wall pier, then two very rude semi-circular arches without mouldings, with a circular column having a spare capital, which has an early character. The south arcade is entirely pointed, and with octagonal columns. The clerestory has no windows. The parapets of the aisles moulded; the aisles of the chancel loftier than those of the nave. The doorway within the porch is continuous. The font is attached to the large north pier, of cylindrical form, with a moulded band, and upon a square base. The east window is a hideous Venetian one. The situation of the church is striking and lonely; the churchyard on a steep bank below which flows the Wharfe.

ST. OSWALD, ARNCLIFFE (IN CRAVEN).

June 11, 1856.—A neat church, entirely rebuilt except the tower. It has a chancel and nave without aisles, and has indications of care and appropriate fittings. The chancel, stalled, has a cornice and stained glass. The new body appears to be wider than the original one, the tower arch not being in the centre of the west end. The tower is plain Perpendicular, embattled with four pinnacles, and belfry windows of three lights.

ST. MICHAEL, KIRKBY IN MALHAMDALE.

June 12th, 1856.—A large church, mostly, if not entirely, Perpendicular, and generally of a rather coarse character. It consists of a nave and undivided chancel, with aisles continued to the east end, an engaged west tower, and a south porch. The piers of the nave are remarkable for being charged with niches, but they are all rather coarse and shallow. On the north are two with pedestals for images, varying in form, and over one is I.H.C. On the south, some of these niches have embattled cornices, and one a cross in the upper part. The arcades are each of six bays, the arches pointed, the piers octagonal with capitals. There appears to be an extent occupying one arch and a half, which forms the chancel. The clerestory is continued, like the arcade, quite to the east end, and has on the north two-light windows, but three-lights on the south, all square-headed, shouldered internally and without foils. There are late wood screens of poor work enclosing the chancel. The tower arch has very bold strong mouldings, and springs from octagonal columns. The roofs are plain wood ones, rather more ornate in the aisles where are bosses. The windows of the aisles are mostly square-headed and late. The east window of five lights is pointed, but of late character. At the east end of the south aisle is a small rectangular piscina under the window. The tower is engaged with the aisles, to which it opens on the north and south by pointed arches rising upon strong brackets. The pulpit is on a stone base. The old font is mutilated, has a cylindrical early bowl upon a square base. There is a rude painting, representing figures of Death and Time, on the west wall. The south porch is wholly of stone, having a battlement and a roof formed by strong arched ribs. The western part of the clerestory is embattled, but not the rest. The other parts have moulded parapets, except the north aisle. The tower is embattled, has corner buttresses, which are charged with shields. On the west side, a three-light window, but no door. The belfry windows of three-lights, and on the south side of the tower a niche. There is the shaft of a cross in the churchyard, and near the south porch a slab bearing a cross flory.

ENGLISH RHYME IN THE HOLDERNESS DIALECT, WRITTEN IN 1392.

This piece fairly represents the Northern dialect; as spoken in a district (such as Holderness), not much beyond the Midland border. The final e does not form an extra syllable, as in Southern English; though it would improve the metre to read both-e as a dissyllable in line 14. Frers in line 4 should of course be Frer-es or Frer-is, the usual (dissyllabic) Northern plural. Hel is written for held, an error for hold or hald; to hold up is the usual Middle-English equivalent of the Norman law-term maynten (line 8). To "hold up and maintain" is, practically, much the same as "aid and abet." In line 11, negh-e-boure is trisyllabic, as usual. Distinctly Northern forms are ilkan, ilk, mare, wrang, sikerly.

There are several difficulties. We appears to be the Norse form of wo, A.S. wā, a cry of lamentation. The phrase 'with-al for to bake,' lit. 'to bake with-al,' or 'to assist in baking,' points to the very frequent complaints made, at this time, against fraudulent bakers. Stond is a stand, i.e. making a stand, resistance. Stoure is the usual word for conflict. Hethyng, i.e. contumely, despite, scorn, is a well-known Norse word; see Stratmann's Middle-English Dictionary. Vilans is an adjective; a remarkable variant of villanous, i.e. villainous. To a-corde is to come to terms. Dressyng is ironical; as in "to give a man a dressing." In line 27, the insertion of that helps both metre and sense. In lines 28, 29, also scans better than als; though als, with a strong accent, may be meant, as the metre is rough. Sel means "happiness;" as usual. The e in wel and in sel is long.

The piece can best be understood by help of a paraphrase. The sense is as follows:—

"In the country was heard a lament, that there should be evil men in our district, for the purpose of baking. It is so amongst these friars (here), and amongst many other orders (of friars), whether they sleep or wake.

"And yet each one of them will aid the other, and abet him as if he were his brother, both in wrong and right. And so will we, both in making a stand and when attacked, abet our neighbour with all our might.

"Every man may (freely) come and go, both to and fro, amongst us; this I tell you for a truth. But we will put up with no scorn, neither from Hobbè nor from John, at the hands of any man whosoever.

"For we should be unnatural, if we suffered, at the hands of less or greater, any villanous contempt, unless it were again doubly repaid, and he (the offender) should come to terms and be very glad to put up with our handling.

"And in that resolve we still take our stand; whosoever may do us (i.e. any one of us) any wrong, in whatever place it may happen, yet he might just as well do it against us all; (so swear I) as I hope to have good luck and prosperity."

The general sense is obvious. The friars all support one another; and we bakers mean to act in the same way. No doubt this was construed as a defiance to the authorities; in which sense it was probably more or less intended.

LXVIII.

EXCAVATIONS ON THE SITE OF ALMONDBURY CASTLE.

By S. J. CHADWICK, F.S.A.

In digging the foundations of the Victoria Jubilee Tower, which is about to be erected on the site of the "Castle" on Almondbury Castle Hill, near Huddersfield, some interesting discoveries have been made which may help to settle some doubtful questions. In the north-eastern part of the castle area a shaft, five feet six inches square, has been found, and when visited on the 7th May by some members of our Council, in company with Mr. F. W. Beadon, the agent of Sir J. W. Ramsden, it had been cleared to a depth of thirty-three feet, and found to be sunk through the "rag" stone, and not walled. It is supposed to have been a well for the supply of the castle, and to go down to the water level of existing wells on the north and south sides of the hill, i.e., to a depth of about 120 feet from the surface or castle area. The material excavated had been piled round the mouth of the shaft, and formed a level platform of about eight feet in height. Forming a sort of base for this soil, and immediately above the natural surface of the ground, are two, and on one part, three courses of loose undressed stone, which have probably come out of the shaft, and are too loosely placed to form a pavement. Two courses extend over the entire area in a sort of herring-bone arrangement, divided by a few inches of soil or debris. The third (or partial) course lies under the herring-bone courses on the north side of the shaft. It is difficult to suggest a reason for these layers or courses of stone.

In clearing out the shaft, ten dressed stones of different sizes were found, of which two of the largest measure roughly about two feet six inches in each dimension, and have evidently formed parts of a door and a window. Another stone was the small keystone of an arch, and another is shaped as if it had formed part of an arch. Some small stones showed signs of fire, and a large lump of brick and cement was found, fused together by fire. A large quantity of bones has been brought out of the shaft, and carefully preserved for examination by experts. About twenty feet down the shaft are two irregular shapeless holes in the north and south sides facing each other, about two feet in diameter, and from two to three feet in depth from front to back. The discoveries tend to prove that there has been a substantial building of brick and stone on the hill, and it is very desirable to take advantage of the workpeople being on the hill to dig cross sections, in the hope of finding foundations and other remains; and particularly the ditches and banks should be cut through, so as to recover original sections, and also on the chance of finding remains of timber palisading or walls. Castle Hill was visited by the Society on the 28th August, 1867, under the guidance of Mr. Thos. Brooke, then as now their president.

ADDITIONAL NOTE ON THE LOWTHORPE BRASS.

BY MILL STEPHENSON, B.A., F.S.A.

By the courtesy of Mr. Everard Green, F.S.A., Rouge Dragon, the writer is enabled to supplement the notice of this figure given in the Journal, Vol. xiv. p. 510. In a volume of Yorkshire Church Notes, now preserved in the College of Arms, it appears that Dugdale visited this church, or as he calls it "Lowthrop," and noted the following inscription "super tumulum prostratum" hic jacet Georgius Salbrine armiger qui obiit IV° die Januarii A° d'ni M° CCCC° XVII° et Elizabetha uxor ejus que obiit iiii° die mensis Octobris A° d'ni M° CCCC° XVI° quorum animabus propicietur deus. Amen.

Prickett in his History of Bridlington, first edition, 1831, p. 126, quoting from a MS. in the Bodleian Library, says: "On a marble the portraiture in brasse of a man and woman," and gives the inscription but prints the name as "Salram." In the second edition, 1835, this account is omitted.

THE WATERWORKS AT YORK IN 1682.

By F. R. FAIRBANK, F.S.A.

The following, which I have come across in A Descriptive Catalogue of Documents relating to Battle Abbey, and the Webster family once owners, and others, by Thorpe, 1835, may be of interest to members residing in the City of York:—

Henry Whistler, Articles of Agreement with William Pawley and Edward Dallow, April 8, 1682: recites the Grant from the Mayor and Authorities of York to the said Henry Whistler, April 1, 1677, of the "Auncient Building or Tower called the Water-house Tower, situate on the East side of the River Ouse, used as a Water-house, with Waterworks, for the supply of the Citizens of York with Water, &c." This agreement covenants that Pawley and Dallow shall build new works on the scite of said Tower, fully efficient to supply the City with Water for private use: and large public Cocks for use in case of Fires, and enjoy the Profits for forty-two years. Dated April 8, 1682.

Lease of the said Tower, Land, and Emoluments, for forty-two years, to Gabriel Whistler, of Combe, co. Southampton, and Anthony Merry (sic), of London, Merchant, in trust for the said Pawley and Dallow, from Henry Whistler, Esq^r. Same date, with all their autographs and seals.

Anthony Merry (sic), Assignment of his Residue of the Lease granted by Henry Whistler, Esq^r, of Forty-two years, relative to the Waterworks for the City of York, to John Elan and Thomas Browne, of York, Bricklayers: Edward Dallowe, of S. Mary Matfelon, otherwise Whitechapel, then deceased. Dated July 6, 1716.

Henry Whistler, Lease to Elan and Browne, for the remainder of the said Term of Forty-two Years. Dated July 6, 1716.

Bonds of the said John Elan and Thomas Browne, to Henry Whistler, Anthony Merry, and Thomas Dallowe, for Performance of Covenants. July 6, 1716.

The Whistler property went by marriage to the family of Webster, Bart.

THE BLESSING OF THE EPISCOPAL ORNAMENT CALLED THE PALL.

By J. WICKHAM LEGG, F.S.A.

THE recent gift of an omophorion by a Russian bishop to the Archbishop of York during his journey in Russia has brought the connexion of the eastern omophorion with the western pallium into some notice. It seems unlikely that any antiquary at the present day will doubt that they are the same vestment¹; it is true the western pallium has undergone changes in shape, arrangement, and length, if not in material, while the eastern omophorion would seem to be still almost identical with the scarf which we see on the consul in the ivory diptychs of the fifth and sixth centuries: it is akin also to the earlier scarves seen on the base of a pillar in the forum at Rome, attributed by some to the third or fourth century, and to the scarves on the figures of the arch of Constantine, to be seen in a horizontal bas-relief on the right hand side of the observer as he stands with his back to the 'Meta sudans.' Similar scarves may be seen in some of the sarcophagi in the Christian museum of the Lateran², and elsewhere.

A late painting, perhaps of the seventeenth century, still exists in the Coptic church of Abu Sargah, showing St. Michael in a scarf arranged like those of the consular diptych, but marked with crosses.³ There are indeed much earlier western representations of angels in pallia. In the ancient church underneath the basilica of St. Clement in Rome, there are angels on each side of our Lord, with omophoria, while an attendant prelate wears the western *pallium*⁴. In the well-known prae-Norman manuscript, Nero C. iv. in the British Museum, there is, on leaf 30, a picture of angels wearing pallia. In the Benedictional of St. Æthelwold, a figure wears a pallium with Scs. Benedictus Abbas written on the pallium itself¹. SS. Gregory and Cuthbert, standing on each side of St. Benedict, have pallia of the same shape. The artist seems to use the pallium or omophorion in some cases as a mark of dignity merely.

But at the present time, and for centuries past, the pallium has been restricted to bishops. In the east, the omophorion is now the special episcopal ornament given to each bishop at the time of his consecration; while in the west, though the pallium is also limited to bishops, and called the fulness of the episcopal office, yet it is chiefly given to metropolitans and archbishops, and rarely to simple bishops. In the east, every bishop has a right to the omophorion. In the west, the pallium cannot be claimed as a right; it is a mark of favour from the Roman pontiff, and is only given to those bishops whom the Roman Curia delights to honour.

The omophorion or pall, given to the Archbishop of York, is one long strip of cloth of silver, lined at the back with white silk, thirteen feet five inches long, and ten inches broad throughout, bordered on each side of the entire length with gold lace an inch and a quarter broad. It can be laid flat on a plane surface², and when thus laid, about one half of the upper surface shows cloth of silver, while the under surface is white silk, and the remaining half of the upper surface is white silk, while the under surface is cloth of silver. In other words, the disposition of the two materials is reversed about the midst of the vestment. This reversal of the two fabrics is brought about by the disposition of the vestment round the neck. The part which hangs down in front to the feet passes up over the left shoulder, behind the neck, over the right shoulder, and then down to the centre of the chest, where it is reversed before passing up again over the shoulder to hang down behind the back. The part which hangs in front is 83 inches long up to the place in front of the chest where it is reversed; and the part which falls behind is 78 inches from the same place of reversion.

The vestment is embroidered with four crosses, and on the longer piece of cloth of silver there is also a star which comes immediately behind the neck. This star is now universal in the Russian omophoria. There are also three fringes of gold at the end of each portion of the omophorion.

There are golden buttons and loops attached to the edges of the omophorion by means of which it is fastened so as to hang in its proper shape. There are also two buttons behind to fasten it to the saccos, and one in front to keep the omophorion straight in its place.

It will be noticed that the eastern omophorion has preserved two characters which the modern western pallium has lost, but which appear in the arms of the see of Canterbury of the present day; viz.: a fringe at the end of the pallium, and a border along its breadth. A fringe is seen in the western pallium after it had ceased to be a scarf and had assumed its present shape of a circlet round the neck with pendants before and behind. And the tradition of a border is affirmed by the effigy of Innocent III., recently set up by Leo XIII. in the Lateran Basilica in the transept, on the right hand side of the spectator facing the choir. Innocent III. is in a white chasuble, and the pallium is marked out by a gold border which separates it very distinctly from the chasuble of the same colour. A separate paper is needed to deal with the changes that the western pallium has undergone, whether in material, or shape, or width, or ornamentation. Pater Grisar has recently treated of several of these points at length.¹ He dismisses, with something like scorn, the theory of the pall having its source in the cloak of St. Peter.

In the west, the pallium, or in English, pall, had become the special mark by which the wearer was invested by the pope with the fulness of the episcopal office, so that when the bishops of England, with the lower houses, determined to reject what was called the usurped power of the pope², it is not surprising to find that the pall was no longer to be asked for from Rome.

Accordingly it was enacted that no person should be disturbed from an archbishoprick for lack of pall, bulls, or other things, but that the archbishop and bishops confirming the election should give the elect the pall, benedictions, and ceremonies, without obtaining any bulls or briefs from the see of Rome.³ The practice of the eastern church was ample authority for this act. And the first archbishop of York after the breach with Rome had the pall given to him by the other archbishop of England and the confirming bishops. The pall was blessed by the archbishop of Canterbury, and delivered to the archbishop of York in the chapel at Lambeth. The form here ture, any greater jurisdiction in the kingdom of England than any other foreign bishop." The king's proclamation, "abolishing the usurped power of the pope," follows on June 9. (Gee and Hardy, Documents illustrative of English Church History, Lond. 1896, p. 251.)

² In the MS. there is one too many strokes for 'numine.' The scribe may have intended 'munimine,' as in the following form.

ei commissos iter vite ingredi [celestis] et cum eo Regni tui consocii fieri mereantur, per dominum nostrum etc.¹

The form opens with a few versicles and a collect, which are the same as those in the office for the enthronization of an archbishop, which has been printed by Mr. Maskell². Then the form for the blessing of the pall itself follows. It is ushered in by a few versicles which are common enough, but the benediction itself I have been as yet unable to find elsewhere. Some of the phrases are well known, such as the opening, 'Summe vere sacerdos,' which are the first words of a long prayer often said by the priest before mass³, and attributed to St. Augustine.

The words used at the sprinkling of the pall with holy water are curiously like the words used at the blessing of incense in the mass;⁴ but it may be observed, no incense is directed to be used with the holy water, as in the blessing of the pall at Rome.

The delivery of the pall then takes place. The form, in its earlier part, is adapted from that in the Roman rather than from that in the English pontificals; the latter part is certainly borrowed from the English forms. The Roman form runs thus:

Ad honorem omnipotentis dei: et beate marie semper virginis: ac beatorum apostolorum petri et pauli: domini nostri pape .N. et sancte romane ecclesie: Necnon ecclesie .N. tibi commisse tradimus tibi pallium de corpore beati petri sumptum: in quo est plenitudo pontificalis officii cum patriarchalis vel archiepiscopalis nominis appellatione: ut utaris eo infra ecclesiam tuam certis diebus: qui exprimuntur in privilegiis ab apostolica sede concessis. In nomine patris et filii et spiritus sancti⁵.

The resemblance of this form to that of the first part of Cranmer's is marked. Only instead of the pope we have the king: instead of the church of Rome we have the church of England: and the metropolitan church of York is mentioned by name. The pall is still the fulness of the episcopal office, but it is no longer taken from the body of the blessed Peter. Then we pass at 'Accipe igitur frater charissime' to the section taken from the English pontificals, which read as follows:

Accipe pallium summi sacerdotii Domini Dei tui signum, per quod undique vallatus atque munitus, valeas hostis humani tentamentis resistere, et omnes insidias ejus a penetralibus cordis tui, divino munimine fultus, procul abjicere: præstante Domino nostro, Jesu Christo, qui vivit et regnat Deus, per omnia sæcula sæculorum. Amen¹.

The days on which the Archbishop of York had been accustomed from of old to wear the pall, and which are spoken of in Cranmer's form for delivering the pall, may be seen in the part of the Registrum Album given to us by Dr. Henderson².

The prayer after the delivery of the pallium may be found in an office for the enthronization of an archbishop, printed by Dr. Henderson from the pontifical of De Martival³. This text has some verbal variations, but it is evidently of the same stock.

Thus, with the exception of the form for the blessing of the pall, the rest of the service has been taken from old sources. The middle ages had been accustomed to see the pall brought from Rome ready for use. Cranmer must have been thrown back upon his own resources for devising a form of benediction. I have been able to throw no more light upon the sources of Cranmer's service than was thrown some forty years ago, when the form was first edited by no less a scholar than the present bishop of Oxford, Dr. Stubbs⁴.

I am indebted to Mr. W. J. Birkbeck, F.S.A., the well-known authority on all matters connected with the Slavonic branch of the orthodox church, for the following notes on the blessing of the omophorion or pall in Russia.

"The eastern bishop in vesting blesses each ornament as it is brought with the sign of the cross, and he kisses it, and then he is vested in it: while the Proto-deacon says what has to be said. In the case of the omophorion, he says:

'On [Thy] shoulders, O Christ, having taken [our] lost⁵ nature, Thou didst ascend, and didst bring it to God and the Father, alway, now and ever, and to ages of ages. Amen.'

Nicolski, an extremely good Russian ritualist, says the following upon the subject:

'The omophorion signifies the sheep which had strayed, that is to say, the lost human race; while the bishop, when he is robed in this vestment, bears the image of Christ the Saviour, who, as the good Shepherd, took upon His shoulders the lost sheep, and brought it to the sheep which had not strayed, that is to say, to the angels in the home of the heavenly Father (Luke xv. 4-7), and this is the reason that in ancient times the omophorion was made of lambs' wool. At the vesting of a bishop, for the omophorion the deacon says: On thy shoulders, etc. etc.' [See above.]

⁵ The Slavonic word equals Greek παραλημμένον φύειν. One would like to get a better word than "lost," but one can only save the force of the perfect participle by a paraphrase such as "which had gone astray." Perhaps this is better. Matthew xviii. 13.

The taking off and putting on of the omophorion during the Liturgy corresponds exactly to this: whenever the bishop represents Christ he wears it, whenever something else represents Christ he removes it. Thus he removes it for the Epistle (when the apostle, not the bishop, is representing Christ) and the Gospel. This appears to be very ancient. It is apparently referred to in the 5th century by Isidore Pelusiota (Ep. i. 145) as follows:

‘The bishop, representing Christ, by his very clothing shows to all that he is the imitator of that blessed and great Pastor, who willed to bear the weakness of the flock: and therefore, when at the opening of the [Book of the] Gospels, the true Pastor himself appears, the bishop immediately lays aside the vestment of imitation, giving thereby to know of the presence of the Lord and Chief of Pastors.’

Again at the great entrance he removes it, and immediately after the Epiclesis, or consecration of the Eucharist, but assumes it again for the elevation at ‘Holy things for the holy,’ the fraction, and communion.”

In the west, we have records of the forms of blessing, or rather of watching, the pall at Rome in the twelfth century, given us by one of the canons of the Vatican basilica as part of his own professional experience. It was quite simple. The palls, wrapt in linen, were brought down into the confession of the basilica; and a nocturn said over them, taken from the mattins of the feast of St. Peter and St. Paul (July 29th). This part of the service may be found in Tommasi’s edition of a Vatican manuscript¹, but it does not precisely correspond with the service now used, either in the Roman breviary or in the Vatican breviary. The psalms, lessons, and responds were followed by Te decet laus. This does not seem to be the 64th psalm, which begins with Te decet hymnus; for I do not find any Old Latin version of this psalm (such old versions were, and are still, used in the Vatican basilica) which begins Te decet laus instead of hymnus. Tommasi points out that it is a hymn: and he gives the text:

*Te decet laus, te decet hymnus, tibi gloria Deo Patri et Filio cum Sancto Spiritu in saecula saeculorum. Amen*².

It is a Benedictine hymn, which to this present day may be found in the monastic breviaries, sung on Sundays after the gospel at mattins. The collect Deus qui beato Petro may be found in the modern mass book as the collect for the feast of St. Peter’s chair at Rome (January 18th). With this collect the blessing is over, unless mass be said next day at the high altar; in which case the palls are put there; and when mass has been said, they are taken away. If there be no mass next day, they are returned to the pope’s familiar. No special time of the year seems assigned to the service. Monday in Holy week is spoken of as one of the days on which the palls were blessed.

It may be noticed that no hint is given of the presence of any but the canons of the Vatican at this blessing of the palls, nor of any special form of blessing such as that which, as we shall see, was printed by de Bralion,¹ or used by Cranmer. The hallowing would seem to be brought about by the palls having rested upon the bodies of SS. Peter and Paul.

Thus the pall became especially a relic from the body of the blessed Peter, like the other cloths or veils taken from the confessions of apostles². The priestly stole was consecrated by being placed the night before the Saturday in Ember week in the confession of St. Peter³. And when the emperor had been crowned, the sword is given to him from the altar of St. Peter with these words: *Accipe Gladium desuper beati Petri Corpore sumptum*⁴.

It is an idea which we find in the very earliest times, when from St. Paul's body "were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons⁵." The same idea of a blessing being given by contact with the shrine of a saint still survives in Italy. Last year, the centenary of St. Ambrose, visitors were allowed to go down to the sarcophagus of St. Ambrose, under the high altar of the church of St. Ambrose at Milan. The guide took our handkerchiefs, laid them on the tomb of St. Ambrose for a moment, and then returned them to us.

Gregory, of Tours, speaks of the practice in his time. He says that in the sepulchre of St. Peter, under the altar, was an opening into which it was the custom to put cloths, which gained in weight, as is not at all unlikely, by this probable exposure to moisture.⁶ The tomb is said to have been blocked up to prevent the anti-popes getting to it. Late in the sixteenth century, in 1594, the tomb and opening were re-discovered by James a Porta.⁷ The golden cross, said to have been placed by Constantine on the tomb of the Apostles,⁸ was recognised by Clement VIII. There is a drawing of this tomb, which shows a sort of arcosolium; in the arch is a mosaic of our Lord, blessing in the Greek manner with the right hand, and holding a book with the left; in the table of the arcosolium is a square opening.⁹ This opening Clement VIII. is said to have had sealed up with cement, and a new altar built over it.

The following description of the ceremony of watching the palls was written by a canon of St. Peter's in the twelfth century. It has been edited by Paul de Angelis, who gave the author's name as Romanus;¹ but the Bollandists give to him the name of Petrus Mallius:

Quod in Beati Petri Basilica tantum vigilantur Pallia, quae Dominus Papa mittit Archiepiscopis.

Et quoniam haec sacrosancta Dei, et Beati Petri Basilica est fundamentum, et caput omnium aliarum Ecclesiarum, dicente Domino: Tu es Petrus, et super hanc petram aedificabo Ecclesiam meam: et tu vocaberis Cephas, id est, Caput, quadam prerogativa, in ea tantum vigilantur Pallia, quae Dominus Pontifex Romanus mittit Patriarchis, et Archiepiscopis per vniuersum orbem constitutis. Et inde est, quod Legatus sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae dicit: Accipe pallium de corpore B. Petri sumptum, in plenitudinem officii tui. Itaque cum vigilamus Pallia, facimus solempnes vigilias in confessione Beati Petri, cantantes vigilias, quas consueuimus cantare in festo eiusdem Apostoli. Et de antiqua consuetudine habemus, ad bibendum, de Confessione abundanter, optimum claretum. Qualiter debemus pannos laneos, vnde fiunt Pontificalia [Pallia] ad beati Petri corpus vigilare, sicut vidi ego Presbyter Romanus, huius Sacrosanctae Basilicae Canonicus, ad posteritatis memoriam scribo. Acceptis de Altari faculis, et cereis ad legendas lectiones, et orationes vigiliarum, necnon incenso; circa sero conueniunt Canonici ad Altare S. Leonis Papae: et Presbyter Ebdomadarius accipit ipsos pannos complicatos et inuolutos in sindone, praecedentibus tam mansionariis cum incenso, et faculis accensis, quàm Canonicis, intrat ad corpus beati Petri, et ponit eos supra altare, et faculae ante altare ponuntur. Tunc Chorus, cuius est cantus, incipit antiphonam: Si diligis me Simon Petre, et reliqua, cum suis psalmis; versic. Tu es Pastor ouium: Tres lectiones leguntur in libro Stationali: Petrus et Ioannes ascendebant in Templum: et cantatis duobus responsoriis, quae voluntur de sancto Petro, deinde sequitur, Te decet laus: et oratio, Deus qui beato Petro Apostolo tuo collatis clauibus. Sic reportantur, sicut allata fuerunt. Si altero die cantatur Missa super Maiori Altare, ponantur ibi: et post completam Missam tollantur. Sin autem, reddantur misso Domini Papae. Et dantur Canonicis, quoties has vigilias celebrant, tres solidi prouinienses pro clareto: faculae verò Camerario Canonicorum remanent, quae de Altaris communi cum cereis, et incenso, et prouiniensibus dantur. Sic vidi tempore Domini Caelestini Tertii Papae fieri: sic scio factum per socios, et dominos meos tempore Domini Clementis Tertii Papae: sic etiam in secundo anno eiusdem [Caelestini] Pontificis, Indictione decima, mensis Martii die 30. quae fuit tunc feria secunda ante Pascha².

If we may forget the dignity of history for a moment, it is amusing to note the zest with which the good canon tells us of the excellent wine which was served in abundance on these occasions of watching the palls. Perhaps this canon of St. Peter's was accustomed to think more of the refreshment of the body than of the mind, for his knowledge of ecclesiastical matters does not seem very complete. In his zeal for the church of which he was a member, he forgets the metropolitan rights of St. John Lateran, when he tells us that the Vatican basilica is the foundation and head of all churches. Most ecclesiastical historians recognise the claim of the Lateran to be the mother and mistress of all churches, as the inscription on its front asserts to this day;¹ and his acquaintance with the Bible does not seem very full, when he gives the interpretation of Cephas as head. The Vulgate reads differently: Tu vocaberis Cephas: quod interpretatur Petrus,² that is, a stone, as the Authorised Version also reads. A few pages after he tells us also that the first chair of St. Peter was at Alexandria, not, as the Roman Church usually teaches, at Antioch.³

And he notes the fees given to the chapter for the claret.⁴ This does not seem to be connected with the sums paid to the Roman court for the pall. These would have gone to the Apostolic subdeacons who have charge of the palls from the time that the lambs are offered at St. Agnes, on January 21st, to the day when they are given up to the metropolitans. This charge was a percentage, says Christopher Marcellus, upon the revenues of the metropolitan church in question.⁵

In the time of St. Gregory the Great it is clear that money had been given for the pall. The pope, writing to the bishop of Corinth, says it is known that formerly the pall was given only after some payment had been made; but this being undesirable, he had called a council before the body of St. Peter, that it might be strictly forbidden to receive anything either for ordination or the pall.⁶ It is

² Iohann. i. 42.

⁵ Qui pallium sunt accepturi componunt primum cum subdiaconis [apostolicis] nam illi ut diximus tenent pallia. Qui accipiunt secundum ualorem, et taxam Ecclesie aliquando plus: aliquando minus pro centenario. (Rituum Ecclesiasticorum Christophori Marcelli, lib. i. sect. x. cap. v. ⁶ Novit fraternitas vestra, quia prius pallium nisi dato commodo non dabatur. Quod quoniam incongruum erat, facto concilio ante corpus beati Petri Apostolorum principis, tam de hoc, quam de ordinationibus aliquid accipere, sub stricta interdictione vetuimus. (Vita S. Gregorii, a Iohanne diacono edita, iii. 5. in Surius, De vitis Sanctorum, Venetiis, 1581, t. ii. fo. 42.)

plain, however, that by the time of Marcellus the officials of the Curia had gone back to the custom forbidden by St. Gregory, and it is possible that even as early as the time of St. Boniface they had returned to the practice.¹ Gatticus prints a Vatican manuscript, in which it is said that if the archbishopric be worth six thousand francs, the archbishop pays two hundred or one hundred francs. The archbishop of Sens gave the Apostolic sub-deacon one hundred and thirty francs; he of Rouen one hundred and fifty.²

In the middle of the fifteenth century we have another description of the same ceremony, by Mapheus Vegius. It is still held in the confession of St. Peter, and the mattins of St. Peter are recited; but penitential psalms, and litanies, and other mysteries of sacred prayers are said, of which psalms, and litanies, and sacred prayers, we find no great notice in the account of the twelfth century. The custom of drinking abundantly of the best wine, well spiced, had gone out.

[Pallia] Quorum consecratione, cum locus ipse, quem sub altari positum, Confectionem B. Petri appellant; tum processioneis devotio officique solennitas, maximam iure merito sanctissimamque videri facit. Nam praeter psalmos poenitentiales et litanias ac cetera sacrarum orationum mysteria, eadem etiam, quae in Apostoli Petri die festo solent, vigiliae magna cum exultatione decantatae, celebrantur. Cui accedebat aliud, quod nunc nescio qua causa, exolevit, non modicum hilaritatis et laetitiae monumentum. Nam perfectis divinis consolationibus, tum consolari corpora incipiebant; exhibebaturque omnibus abundanter optimum vinum, optimis aromatibus medicatum³.

The placing of the palls upon the bodies of SS. Peter and Paul is shortly spoken of by Marcellus, a writer who represents the practice of the Roman court about 1488.⁴ The saying of mattins while the palls rested upon the bodies of SS. Peter and Paul are all the rites mentioned.

Until the middle of the seventeenth century, there appears to be no further information about the hallowing of the palls. In the interval, there has grown up a new custom, an addition to that which went before, of blessing the palls by a form of words as well as by leaving them for a time on the tomb of SS. Peter and Paul. Benedict XIV. seems to attribute this to the change made in the shape of the high altar of St. Peter's as well as to the disappearance of the custom of saying mattins at night¹. This rite is recorded by Nicholas de Bralion, a priest of the French Oratory, who published in 1648 a tract on the pall, at the end of which he gives in full a form of blessing taken from an "ancient book" belonging to the Vatican basilica². A bishop has now become the necessary minister of this benediction; but mattins are still an essential part of the rite; and the bishop who is to bless the palls must be present at the mattins. Instead of being an ordinary day, as it was in the twelfth century, it must now be a principal feast; but it does not seem certain what the mattins were, though the officiating bishop is told to begin mattins with O Lord, open thou our lips, as on the day of the apostles. Mattins seem to be said before the confession itself, as in the twelfth century, in the area of the confession in front of the metal grate which guards the confession.

³ The following translation of the rubric has been given me by a friend. The translation of a prayer needs a special rare gift, and the attempt has not been made beyond the first words:

"The order of the Blessing of Palls, which is performed in the church of St. Peter at Rome, as a mark of its chief pre-eminence.

"When the Apostolic Sub-Deacons, who have the care of palls, wish that some palls be blessed, their Dean must first ask the Vicar of the aforesaid church whether he be willing to bless them (for it is his duty if he be a bishop) or some bishop among the canons of the aforesaid church. If none of them be willing, the aforesaid Dean must provide some bishop of the [Roman] Court to perform the blessing. They must agree on a day for the blessing. This day must be one of the solemn feasts, and the said Dean must tell the altarist thereof. On the day appointed for this purpose, at the hour agreed (having already bidden some of the beneficed laymen and beneficed clerks of the aforesaid church to say mattins) he shall prepare a table like an altar in the midst of the place called the confession of Blessed Peter, near the metal grate, which guards the said confession, under the high altar, and he shall cover the table with a fair linen cloth, and on it place two candlesticks with their lights. He shall also place a stole for him that is to bless the palls, with a white cope, a plain mitre, and the order of blessing. At the right-hand side of the table or thereabouts he shall direct that there be a processional cross, a censer with coals, a ship with incense, and a spoon; also a holy water vat and sprinkler; and near the balustrade of the chapel, a lectern with a book for mattins, and a bench for him that is to bless the palls. When all has been thus arranged, after compline in the said church, all those bidden shall assemble at the aforesaid place, and the aforesaid Dean, with an assistant, shall commit to the aforesaid altarist the palls according to the number, for blessing, on the high altar of St. Peter. The altarist, in the presence of the bishop who is to bless the palls, receives them in a silver basin; then the bishop, with the dean and assistant aforesaid, descends

This is the first appearance of the holy water vat and sprinkler, though it is not said when they and the incense were used in the blessing of the palls. Some writers have remarked that none of the holy oils is used.

What is the age of this form? It was printed in 1648, so that it cannot be later than this date. On the other hand, it would seem to be unknown to Marcellus, printing in 1516. Is there any internal evidence of its age? It is clearly a cento at the end; for this is borrowed from different parts of the service for the coronation of the emperor. The early part bears a resemblance in structure to other benedictory forms which may be found in the Roman Pontifical, but without any direct borrowing. The allusion in the middle of the form to the sick that were laid in the streets so that the shadow of St. Peter might fall on some, and to the veils sent for the consecration of churches from the body of St. Peter, seems conceived more in the spirit of a sermon than of a prayer. From the marginal note made by de Bralion, it may be conjectured that the form was first used for the blessing of veils and cloths to be sent abroad, and afterwards adapted to the hallowing of palls. If the suspicion of Benedict XIV. be accepted, the form may be as late as the time of Urban VIII.

If this form were first brought into use for the blessing of the palls after 1516, we approach very near to the year 1534, in which Cranmer used his form in England for the blessing of the pall for the archbishop of York. It thus becomes a question whether Cranmer did not anticipate the court of Rome in providing a verbal form for the blessing of the pall; a question which cannot be answered until the age of the form printed by de Bralion be ascertained. It is curious enough that it should be possible that such a question can be asked.

Another recension of this rubric was printed by Peter Moretti, a hundred years after the appearance of Nicholas de Bralion's tract³.

BENEDICTIO PALLIORUM.

Episcopus sine mitra surgit, et manibus iunctis dicit :

℣. Adiutorium nostrum in nomine Domini.

℞. Qui fecit coelum et terram.

℣. Dominus vobiscum.

℞. Et cum spiritu tuo.

Domine sancte, Pater omnipotens, aeternae Deus, &c.¹

From this recension of the rubric it will be seen that the palls were sprinkled with holy water and censed at the end of the long prayer of benediction.

Within very few years more changes are made, almost revolutionary in character, and these by the hand of one of the most learned ritualists that has sat in the Roman chair. In 1748 Benedict XIV. abolishes the saying of mattins as part of the blessing of the palls, restricts the ceremony to the eve of St. Peter's day, and declares that it is to be performed only by the Roman Pontiff himself, or his deputy, immediately after the first vespers of the feast. Thus the old vigils are discarded; and the blessing takes place, not from the placing of the palls on the tomb of the Apostles while the chapter chant their mattins, but from the words pronounced by the pope himself; for although the palls are brought to the confession of St. Peter, they are not blessed until the pope have said over them the appointed prayer, and as soon as he has said these words they are spoken of as blessed.²

These changes were made by a bull of Benedict XIV., beginning with the words Rerum ecclesiasticarum. In it the pope, after describing the practices used in the middle ages, speaks of the customs in his own time at the blessing of the palls. The palls about to be blessed were put into a golden basin by the canon of the Vatican, called the altarist, and accompanied by twelve beneficed clerks, were carried by him to the confession of St. Peter. There they were placed upon a table covered with a handsome cloth, and set between two lighted candles. Afterwards the bishop who was to bless the palls went down into the confession, sprinkled the palls with holy water, censed them, and recited over them certain benedictions. The palls thus blessed it was not till the time of Nicholas de Bralion that the ceremony was limited to a principal feast: or a bishop necessary for the blessing (see above, p. 132.) All inferences drawn, too, from the language of the blessing are worthless as evidences of the teaching of antiquity; for the form expresses nothing more than the ideas prevalent in the Roman Court in the last century.

remained upon the body of the Apostle for the whole of the octave of the feast. When the octave was over they were taken away by the curators of the vestry, inclosed in a box covered with scarlet silk, and kept in the oratory of the vestry, where the relics of the saints are kept. The key of the box was kept by the first master of the pontifical ceremonies.

The pope tells us that these customs had prevailed until a few years ago, and that he himself has seen them carried out when a canon of the Vatican. But in 1725 Benedict XIII. had himself blessed the palls on February 22nd, the feast of the chair of St. Peter at Antioch.¹ Two years before the publication of the present bull, Benedict XIV. had himself begun to bless the palls on the eve of SS. Peter and Paul, according to the rite now published, which he orders to be hereafter observed.

The pope also ordains that a number of palls, judged to be sufficient for the needs of the Church, shall be taken to the Confession of St. Peter early on the morning of St. Peter's eve, by the altarist, and there placed as described above. After vespers they shall be blessed by the pope himself, or at least by the cardinal in his place. It may be noticed that the sprinkling with holy water and censuring take place before the verbal blessings described by Benedict XIV. not after, as in Moretti's recension.

When the blessing is over, the hallowed palls are to be put into a silver-gilt box, and are to remain in the confession, close to the body of St. Peter. The key of the box is, however, to be kept by the first master of the pontifical ceremonies as heretofore.

The bull ends with the following form :

Formula igitur Precum ad benedicenda Pallia in vigilia Sanctorum Apostolorum Petri, et Pauli, talis est. Post Vesperas, Pontifex, seu Cardinalis, qui illius vice in Pontificalibus Officio adstiterit, ipsa Pallia .ter aspergit aqua benedicta, dicendo Antiphonam Asperges me &c. ac ter Incenso adolet; deinde dicit :

Per eundem &c¹.

The following account of the blessing of the Roman pall is taken from a modern edition of Catalani's Pontificale Romanum.² The account is enclosed in square brackets, as if not belonging to the original text of Catalani.

"We may add here the decrees of Benedict XIV. about the blessing of the palls on the feast of SS. Peter and Paul [June 29], which up to our times are faithfully followed, even as we have seen with our own eyes. Every year this sacred duty is performed (and it is done after the first vespers of the solemn feast) by the Roman pontiff, and if he by chance be absent, by that cardinal who has just said pontifical vespers. The palls are therefore brought to the pontiff, who remains in his chair, by one of the auditors of the causes of the Apostolic Palace, who wears the ornaments of a sub-deacon, and is accompanied on the right and left by two of his colleagues among the auditors, and followed by the advocates of the consistorial court of the pontiff. This duty is laid upon these auditors because to the dean of their college are delivered the lambs from whose fleeces the sacred palls are woven. The advocates of the consistorial court are present, because their duty is to ask of the Roman pontiff the granting of the pall to each metropolitan. Returning therefore from the confession of the chief of the Apostles, where the palls, not yet blessed, have been laid, they stand before the pontiff, who presently rising from his chair, sprinkles the palls with holy water, censes, and afterwards blesses them with the following prayer written by Benedict XIV. himself, in true liturgical style." The text of the blessing then follows.

The source of the wool whence the palls are woven is at present certain lambs offered at the altar of the basilica of St. Agnes, outside the walls, on January 21, St. Agnes' day.¹ This custom can be traced back to the time of Marcellus.² Cassander indeed tells us that formerly certain white lambs without spot were fed by the nuns of the monastery of St. Andrew, close to the church of St. Marcellus, at Rome. On Low Sunday, while Agnus Dei was sung, these lambs were made to go round the altar of St. Peter,³ doubtless that of the Vatican Basilica. These nuns also wove the palls from the wool of the lambs, much, as he says in the margin, the nuns of St. Agnes now do. In the twelfth century the prior of St. Lawrence, of the Sacred Palace, had to make the pall for the pope with his own hands.⁴

The place in which the palls have been kept after being blessed is subject to some variation in the course of history. In the twelfth century, they were given over to the officer of the papal household as soon as they were blessed. And even in the time of Marcellus, the Apostolic Sub-Deacons only kept them in some decent place.⁵ But de Bralion says that the palls, after being left one night upon the tomb of St. Peter, were placed in a box, and kept upon the chair of St. Peter, which, when de Bralion was at Rome, was preserved in the chapel of the greater sacristy, but now is in the chapel which Urban VIII. dedicated.⁶ In Moretti's account, the palls, after lying twenty-four hours upon the tomb of the Apostles, were taken to the chapel of the Relics, and placed upon the altar there. After being numbered in the presence of the Master of the Ceremonies of the Apostolic Palace, they were locked up in a box adorned with silk, the keys of the box given to the Master of the Ceremonies by the altarist, and the box itself containing the palls kept amongst the other relics.⁷

Here we have a distinct recognition of the idea that the pall is a relic, as it is kept among the other relics of the Basilica. But Benedict XIV. changes this; and orders the palls, after being blessed, to remain in the confession of St. Peter, close to the tomb of the Apostles. The key, however, is to be kept by the Master of the Ceremonies, as before.⁸

 "John Fugell, the son of John Fugell, born in Cleford Toware the 20th day of May, and baptised the 16th day of Jun. A. dnio 1657."

² Son and heir of Wm. Robinson, lord mayor in 1619 (by Margaret, sister of Sir Henry Jenkins, Knt., of Grimston. Baptised at St. Crux, 21 Dec., 1601; admitted a freeman in 1627; Knighted in 1633; made an alderman in 1637, but resigned the same year. He married, first, Amy, daughter of Sir Wm. Bambergh, Bart., of Housham, and co-heiress of her brother, Sir John; secondly, Frances, daughter of Sir Thos. Metcalfe, Knt., of Nappa. As Sir William Robinson, Knt., of Newby, he was High Sheriff of the county in 1639. He died at Roecliffe, 1st Sept., 1658, and was buried near his ancestors in the church of St. Crux, Pavement. His successor was his son (by his second wife) Metcalfe, who was created a baronet in 1660. He was an alderman of York, and also represented the city in parliament. Dying without issue, in 1689, he was succeeded by his nephew, William Robinson (son of his brother Thomas), who was high sheriff the same year, and lord mayor in 1700. He died in 1736. The present

⁴ See note 1, supra.

⁶ He was an innholder, one of the chamberlains in 1638, and sheriff in 1642-3.

Thwing, gent., was baptised at Holy Trinity, King's Square. The Thwengs were a Roman Catholic family, and resided at Heworth. In 1604, "the wief of William Twynge, Esq.," was certified to be "an old recusant." She was then living in that part of Heworth which is in the parish of St. Cuthbert. On 24th Sept., 1722, administration of the goods, &c., of Wm. Thweng, of Heworth, gent., was granted to his sister, Catherine, wife of Joseph Seller.

² He died in the following month.

³ Afterwards, Sir Henry Thompson, Knt., of Middlethorpe. He was buried in the chancel in 1692.

⁸ Thomas Carter, merchant, sheriff in 1675-6, lord mayor in 1681, and governor of the Merchants' Company, 1681-84, died in 1686, aged 52, and was buried at St. Martin's, Micklegate. His wife was Sarah, daughter of John Pearson, Esq., of Lowthorpe (by Elizabeth, daughter of John Pearson, of Mowthorpe). She died in 1708. Her eldest brother, Sir Matthew Pearson, Knt., died in 1711, leaving five sons and two daughters. Her youngest sister, Anne, wife of Wm. Walker, I.L.D., died in 1687, aged 25, and was interred at St. Michael's-le-Belfrey.

² He married here, in 1682, Mrs. Eliz. Low.

church in 1733. Alderman Cornwell erected a handsome house on the King's Staith.

Rich. Coulton, Rect.

Apr. 2^d, 1694. Just as I was going to bed at ten a clock this Night, a dreadfull fire broke out in High Ouse-Gate, w^{ch} began by y^e carelessness of one Charles Hall, a Quaker and Hemp-dresser, & consumed many houses; & next morning stopt about y^e Pavem^t Cross. If a temporal fire be so dreadful (as mine Eyes beheld it all night, till teare & sorrow made me unable to look up), what fire is that eternal one w^{ch} is kindled by y^e Breath of y^e Almighty? & from it, Good Lord deliver us. So prayeth Rich. Coulton.

 Dec. 31, John Becke¹⁰ & Sylence Awdasley.
 1639-40. Jan. 30, John Wysdome,¹¹ cler., and Jane Appleton.

² The daughter, perhaps, of Henry Hall, alderman of York, whose infant daughter, Grace, was buried at All Saints', Pavement, in 1583.

⁴ Second daughter of Richard Tempest, Esq., of Tong, near Bradford, by his wife Alice, daughter of Will. Mauleverer, of Arncliffe.

⁶ A younger son, perhaps, of Sir Ralph Maddison, of co. Durham, (who was knighted in 1602). His wife, Katherine, may have been the widow of John Dixon, of Lepton, par. Kirkheaton, and daughter of Arthur Langley, Esq., of Rawthorpe Hall, in the same parish (by Dorothy, daughter of Wm. Cartwright, Esq., clerk of assize for the county).

1641. June 14, Barnaby Bautree,¹ & Elizabeth Shawe.

 May 3, Mr. Christopher Bailes¹¹ & Mrs. Deborah Boswell.
 1683. April 10, Mr. Denton¹² & Mrs. Mary Sowray.

⁴ Richard Hartforth, butcher, son of Peter Hartforth. Admitted a freeman in 1603; chamberlain in 1612, and sheriff in 1622-3. Married, first, before 1615, Katherine, widow of Hugh Hustler, tailor, York. He died in March, 1653-4, and was buried at St. Sampson's. His widow, Frances, married, at St. Mary's, Beverley, 26th Sept., 1654, William Wise, Esq., recorder of that town. She was interred in the same church, 19th Feb., 1663-4.

⁶ He was rector of this parish from 1690 until his death in 1713. See Baptisms, 16th July, 1691, note 3, and Burials, postea.

Rev. Fras. Edgar, rector of Winstead, and widow of John Booth, Esq.

⁸ See Baptisms, 12th Oct., 1674, note 9, On 16th Jan., 1700-1, probate of the will of Richard Sowray, of York, was granted to his son, Richard Sowray.

¹⁰ See Baptisms, 17th April, 1683.

¹ He died in 1774, and was buried at Askham Bryan (see Baptisms, 4th July, 1749). His wife, Mary, was the daughter of John Wood, Esq., of Hollin Hall, and widow of Sam. Clarke, Esq., junior (son of Sam. Clarke, alderman of York, lord of the manor of Askham Bryan), who died in 1744. Their eldest son, the Rev. Thos. Shaak, was appointed curate of Askham Bryan in 1796, and died in 1807.

Dunsley, lord mayor in 1814 and 1824. She died in the Mansion House (being lady mayoress), 13th Nov., 1814. Frances Dunsley, their youngest daughter and co-heiress, married, in 1820, Mr. John Simpson, of York, lord mayor in 1836, who was knighted during his term of office. James, the youngest son of Francis and Hannah Saunders, was a surgeon. He was lord mayor in 1818, and died unmarried, 22nd April, 1824, aged 55.

wife of Francis Denman, Esq., of Retford, by whom she had a daughter and heiress, Frances, who married Sir Thos. Aylesbury, Bart. Their daughter, Frances, married Edw. Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, to whom she bore a daughter, Anne, who espoused King James II., and was mother of Queen Anne.

Kirkby Ouseburn, and gave it to his son Thomas (afterwards Sir Thos. Dickenson, Knt., lord mayor in 1648 and 1657). In his will, dated 18th Dec., 1630, Alderman Dickenson bequeaths to his eldest son, John, £20 a year, with diet, lodging and washing, to be paid out of the manor of Kirkby Ouseburn.

¹ "Michael Fawkes, Esq., of Woodhall, South Duffield and Farnley, died in 1647" (Dugdale's Visitation, ed. Surt. Soc., p. 29). He was the third son of Marm. Fawkes, gent., of South Duffield (by Joan, daughter and heiress of Jas. Blanchard, of Bowthorpe), and was married three times. By his third wife, Mary, eldest daughter of Sir John Molyneux, of Teversall, Notts., he had a son and heir, Thos. Fawkes, Esq., of Farnley, who was 23 years old, and unmarried, in 1665.

² See Baptisms, 13th May, 1619.

co. Linc., by whom he had, with other issue, a son, Lyon, who succeeded as second baronet.

² Henry Thompson, alderman, was buried at St. Michael's, Spurriergate. He was the eldest son of Henry Thompson, merchant, sheriff in 1601-2 (by Mary, his wife), and was aged 24 years and more when his father died in January, 1614-5. He was chamberlain in 1620, sheriff in 1627-8, and lord mayor in 1636 and 1653. His will is dated 3rd June, 1662. In 1615, he was admitted into the Merchants' Company, of which he was governor 1635-7 and 1655-7. His wife was Margaret, widow of Mr. Masterman. She was buried at St. Michael's, 10th Nov. 1663, leaving no issue by Mr. Thompson, whose brother, John Thompson, merchant, was father (by his wife, Alice Masterman, whom he married in 1628) of Sir Henry Thompson, Knt., of Middlethorpe, who was buried in this church in 1690.

 'Here lyeth the body of James Fearne, of the city of York, inhorder, son of Robert Fearne, of this parish, who departed this life the . . . day of May, in the year of our Lord, 1676, aged 69.' Thomas Fearne, merchant, chamberlain in 1665, was probably his brother.

³ Eldest son of Sir John Bright, Bart., of Badsworth, by his first wife, Catherine Hawkesworth. Born about 1658; married Lucy, daughter of Edward, Earl of Manchester, but died without issue.

 Thos. Langley, Esq., of North Grimston, who was a captain in Portugal in 1666.

⁵ Son of George Thweng, Esq., of Heworth, by Anne, fourth daughter of Sir John Gascoigne, Bart., of Barnbrough.
 He was indicted for high treason in July,
 1680, found guilty, and sentenced to death.
 Thoresby, who was present at the trial, says he was condemned "for saying at a consult at Sir Tho. Gascoigne's at Barnbow, that, if they lost this opportunity of killing the king, they could never expect such another." The principal witness against him was the notorious informer Bolron. Mr. Thweng was respited on the 4th of August, but on the 15th of October, there came down an order from the Privy Council, that the law should take its course. He was accordingly executed on October 23rd.—When "search was made for one Mr. Thwinge, a Romish priest," he was found "in the house of one Mrs. Lascells, in Yorke, a Roman Catholic." Thoresby had in his possession a copper plate, found in making a grave in St. Mary's, Castlegate, which, he says, "had been covertly conveyed and fastened on the inside of the coffin of a priest, who was executed for the plot of 1680."

 Upon the plate was inscribed:—"R.D.
 Thomas Thweng de Heworth, collegii anglo-Duaceni sacerdos, post 15 annos in Anglicana missione transactos Eboraci condemnatus, martyrio affectus est Oct.
 die 23, anno Dom. 1680. Duobus falsis testibus ob crimen conspirationis tunc

⁶ Perhaps the person of that name who resided at Balne, and married Jane, sister to Anthony Fletcher, merchant, York, deputy to the company of English merchants at Dordrecht in 1665.

⁷ Probably Everingham Cressy, Esq.
 (son and heir of Everingham Cressy, Esq.,

² Christ. Hildyard, Esq., barrister-at-law, recorder of Hedon, and steward of the courts of St. Mary's Abbey, York, third son of Sir Christ. Hildyard, Knt., of Winestead (by Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Henry Welby, Esq., of Goxhill, co. Linc.). Born in 1615; married Elizabeth, daughter of the Rev. Fras. Edgar, rector of Winestead, and widow of John Booth, Esq. Mr. Hildyard, who resided in York for many years, was an ingenious antiquary, and had a good collection of ancient coins and modern medals. He was the anonymous author of the first work relating to the history and antiquities of the city that is known to have been printed. It was published in 1664, and is entitled, 'A List or Catalogue of all the Mayors and Bayliffs, Lord Mayors and Sheriffs of the most ancient, honourable, noble and loyall City of Yorke, from the time of King Edward the First, untill this present year, 1664.' The volume entitled 'The Antiquities of York city,' &c. by James Torr, gent., and published by Fras. Hildyard in 1719, is nearly a reprint of Mr. Christ. Hildyard's book. By placing Torr's name on the title-page, the publisher involved himself in a paper war, and Mr. Nicholas Torr, the son of the antiquary, publicly announced that his father "never was in any way concerned in the work, but that the same was an injury to his memory, and an imposition upon the world" (A Memoir of the York Press, by Robert Davies, F.S.A.).

mitted to his freedom in 1665. On 16th Jan., 1687-8, he was elected chamberlain, but, on the 27th, he refused to be sworn, saying, in a contemptuous manner, “I will not swear, I will not fine, and I do deny to stand.” He was, however, fined £30. In Sept., 1688, he was elected sheriff, but displaced by the king's mandate on the 9th Nov. following, as was his colleague, Matthew Bayocke, the lord mayor, Thos. Raine, and several of the aldermen.

YORKSHIRE DEODANDS IN THE REIGNS OF EDWARD II. AND EDWARD III.¹

A DEODAND, as will be seen by the extract given below,² was the instrument which was the immediate cause of the death of any reasonable creature. Originally its value was forfeited to the crown to be applied in pious uses, but at an early period, the right to deodands was, for the most part, granted out to the lords of manors or other liberties. This accounts for the number of important towns, and even wapentakes, which are not mentioned, such as York, Hedon, Yarm, etc., and the same is the case with respect to the liberties or wapentakes of Claro, Holderness, and Whitby Strand. The doctrine of later times, as laid down by Bacon, that a deodand must be a chattel, is contradicted by some of the entries here given. It is difficult to understand how any amount of severance could make chattels of things, which savour so strongly of realty, as a mill, a grange, or a ruinous house. The return embraces a period of about fifteen years, and the number of deaths amount to rather more than 155, which gives an average of a little over ten a year. As may be expected, with very few exceptions, the persons named are of inferior rank. A son of Sir Henry Fitz Hugh, William de Everingham, and the Abbot of Vaudey are the only persons of importance.

The different causes of death are worth analysing. A cart and horse are the most fatal, no fewer than 36 owing their death to this cause; while a horse alone is responsible for 27. The fact that as many as 18 people lost their lives by drowning whilst crossing laid down as a rule, that "omnia quæ movent ad mortem sunt deodanda," and therefore, that wherever the thing which is the occasion of a man's death is in motion at the time, not only that part thereof which immediately wounds him, but all things which move together with it, and help to make the wound more dangerous, are forfeited also. As, where a cart meeting a waggon loaded upon the road, and the cart endeavouring to pass by the waggon, was driven upon a high bank, and threw the person that was in the cart just before the wheels of the waggon, and the waggon ran over him and killed him; it was holden, that the streams on horseback, and 15 by the upsetting of boats, in all 33, or one-fifth of the whole, shows us very clearly how exceedingly rare bridges were, and what an important part was played by ferries and fords, or waths, as a means of communication throughout the Middle Ages. By the help of old documents I am enabled to make out a list of no fewer than eight waths in the immediate neighbourhood of Guisbrough alone¹; and a similar list can probably be compiled for many other places. By the side of these fords little wooden bridges were often erected for the convenience of foot-passengers. They do not seem to have been very strongly made, as four persons were killed in consequence of the plank or bridge falling. Of the other causes of death scalding was the most fatal, to which twelve people owed their death, nine died in consequence of a blow from a tree or a branch, in six cases a mill was the cause, in four a pickaxe, in a similar number a beam of wood, and in three a fall from a ladder. The remaining causes only gave rise to one or two fatalities apiece. The most curious is that of a hen, which by upsetting a light set a house on fire, and caused a young girl's death. It is very remarkable that in an agricultural district there is no instance of a person being killed by a bull. The only other animal mentioned besides a horse is a boar, which killed the swineherd (porcarius) at Broughton-in-Cleveland.

As to prices it is very difficult to form any certain estimate, as they varied so much. The price of a horse ranged from 26s. 8d. to 2s., its average price being 5s. or 6s. Its skin was worth in one case 4d., and in another 12d. A cart with two horses was worth only 11d. at North Dalton, but at South Cave 14s. 4d., and one with three horses 40s. A cart alone is twice valued at 3s. 4d., or half a mark, and the same number of times at double the amount. About 5s. seems to have been the usual price. The most valuable deodand was a mill at Howden cart, waggon, loading, and all the horses were deodands, because they all moved ad mortem. But if a man riding upon the shaft of a waggon, fall to the ground and break his neck, the horses and waggon only are forfeited, but not the loading, because it no way contributed to his death. So, where a thing not in motion causes a man's death, that part thereof only which is the immediate cause is forfeited; as where one climbing upon the wheel of a cart falls from it, and dies of the fall, the wheel only is forfeited. Also, if a man riding on a horse over a river is drowned through the violence of the stream, the horse is not forfeited, because not that, but the waters, caused his death. By the opinion of our ancient authors, things fixed to a freehold, as the wheel of a mill, a bell hanging in a steeple, &c., may be deodands; but by the later resolutions, they cannot, unless they were severed before the accident happened. This forfeiture takes place at land only, and doth not extend to the seas that are continually liable to storms and tempests; and therefore a ship in salt water, whether in the open sea, or within the body of a country, from which a man falls and is drowned, is not forfeited. But a ship, by a fall from which a man is drowned in the fresh water, shall be forfeited, but not the merchandise therein, because they no way contribute to his death. (Bacon's Abridgement, S.V. Deodand.)

worth 4li. A hen was worth 2d., a boar 3s. 4d., a pickaxe 1d. or 2d., a ladder 2d. or 6d.; but it is useless multiplying examples without being able to deduce any general rule. A wider survey than is here possible will be requisite before being able to form a true estimate of the range of prices in the reigns of the Second and Third Edward. At the most this can only serve as a contribution to that end.

⁴ Haustrum is a machine for drawing water with. The word only occurs once in classical Latin, namely in Lucretius,

v. 516. "Ut fluvios versare rotas atque haustra videmus." Mr. Monro translates the word as a water-scoop, and gives the following note. "The haustra or austra belong to the rotæ: Nonius p. 13 'austra proprie dicuntur rotarum cadi ab auriendo': he then cites this passage: they are therefore scoops or basons attached to the wheel to lift up the running water." Besides the haustum the following vessels for holding water are mentioned:—patella, plumbum, fornax, cuva, tyne, and olla lutea.

² Spindles. Diminutive of the Latin fusulus, a spindle. Italian, fusolo. In heraldry, a fusil is an elongated lozenge. It is not easy to understand how the mill could have more than one spindle. It may, however, be explained by supposing the spindle in connection with the mill-wheel to have a cogged wheel at the other end, which rotates horizontally against another cogged wheel at the end of a spindle acting vertically to the first spindle. The definition in Ducange seems to imply that the fusels are the cogs of the wheel.

of his wife Isabell, "cosin and heire of Heton" (Yorkshire Archeological Journal, vii., 131n).

⁴ The south aisle was treated as the Soothill aisle, and the gallery over it (removed in 1887) was called the Soothill Loft.

A great part of the glass mentioned by Dodsworth, together with other glass which he does not mention, but which, judging by the fragments that remain, must have been at one time in the church, has long since disappeared.

The glass now remaining was, when I first knew it, mostly in the north and south windows of the old chancel,² but a small portion was in the east window of the north aisle, completely hidden by the gallery, which was removed in the year 1887. I do not think that any of the glass then occupied its original position; and certainly that which was placed in the south window of the chancel had been fixed without any attempt at arrangement, some of the figures being upside down, others being divided, and all being in great disorder, so that until the late restoration many things, such as the two figures of St. Thomas of Canterbury and St. Thaddeus, were completely lost sight of.

In the year 1887 all the old glass was examined and arranged by Mr. Knowles, of York, and under that gentleman's superintendence it was fixed in one of the windows of the north transept.

The general arrangement of the window may be described as follows:—Forming a band of colour across the middle of the window are three panels surmounted with canopies, the tops of which stand out from a quarry background. Above and below these canopied panels on the quarry background are shields of arms, encircled by coloured bands, also smaller circlets or medallions with subjects of a zodiacal character. Each light is also bordered by a band of devices on a coloured ground, representing dolphins, squirrels, vine or hazel leaves, crowns, covered cups, water bougets, &c. So far as I am able to judge, the greater part of this glass is of the early part of the fourteenth century. There is no direct evidence of date, and it is not known when or by whom the glass was placed in the church; but it bears such close resemblance to some of the glass in York Minster, and in some of the York churches, the date of which is known, that there seems to be no difficulty in fixing the date of the Dewsbury glass. The close resemblance between the York glass which I have mentioned and the Dewsbury glass affords some reason for thinking that they were produced by the same maker or makers.

I would particularly draw attention to the borders of squirrels, vine or hazel leaves, castles, covered cups, and fleur de lis, in some of the windows of the York chapter-house and its vestibule. The west window of the north aisle of the nave of York Minster, which is of three lights, has borders of covered cups and castles in the north light; and in the centre light there is a border of heads, some crowned, some with helmets, and some with caps of the same style as some of the Dewsbury heads. The centre light has a line of quatrefoils crossing it near the top of the lower canopy, and there is a smaller line of quatrefoils in each of the other lights. The great west window of the nave has crowns and lions in the borders of some of the lights; and the west window of the south aisle has covered cups, single cups, and castles, in the borders of the lights, and it has also lines of quatrefoils partly defaced. The canopies also resemble those at Dewsbury, except that they are of a lighter shade. The first, second, and third windows from the east on the south side of the nave have many details similar to those of the Dewsbury glass, e.g. the canopies, and borders of covered cups, also the quarries in the second and third windows from the east.

In All Saints' Church, North Street, York, may be seen in the east window of the north aisle covered cups, vine leaves, and quatrefoils under battlemented work, and some fine diaper work.

In the east window of the south aisle of the same church are found double cups and vine leaves, quatrefoils and roundels, and fourteenth century grisaille work with acorns and leaves.

In the church of St. Martin-cum-Gregory, York, in the east window of the south aisle, are grisaille work similar to that in All Saints', North Street; also vine leaves in borders, and some fine ruby diaper.

In St. John, Ousegate, in the east window of the south aisle, is fine ruby diaper; and in the east window of the north aisle (Toller window), date about 1340, are grisaille work in flowing design of a central tree with long branches, also quarries of distinct pattern and borders of crowns.

In St. Dennis, Walmgate, is a mixture of fourteenth and fifteenth century glass, including some beautiful diaper work, seven different designs of coloured cups, a water bouget, crowns in border, and castellated work with traces of portcullis.

I think anyone visiting these churches, and the Minster, and Dewsbury Church, will come to the conclusion that the Dewsbury glass is of the same date and by the same artists as the York glass.

The quarries which form the background of the Dewsbury window are of very good design and execution, and seem to me to be equal, if not superior, to any of the York quarries, not only in the number and variety of the designs, but also in their good drawing and excellent workmanship. It seems pretty clear that they are of early fourteenth century date. The central trunk, with a running pattern of branches, leaves, and acorns, &c., is evidence of an early date, which is supported by other details in the work. The leaves have been identified by Mr. and Mrs. E. K. Clark, with the aid of Mr. Crowther, of the Leeds Philosophical Museum, as maple, ivy, oak, and holly; and the same authorities have identified the following birds, viz., two kinds of wagtails, five kinds of finches, a crested kingfisher, lapwing, titmouse, stork, dove, crow, and hawk. There are also snails with their shells, a cockatrice, a porcupine, and another animal, which may be called a lion. In the lower part of the eastern light, below and on the left of the St. Martin shield, is the head of a female, wearing a sort of kerchief, and the upper part of whose dress has a kind of border of quatrefoils. In the upper part of the centre light, right and left of the upper canopy, are two quarries, whose pattern is that of the cross. The other quarries have three kinds of border, viz., one plain black, one ornamented and coloured, and one plain and coloured. The trunk of the tree or flowing pattern does not appear in all the lights; and it is therefore probable that as the quarries now remaining show so many different designs, they were originally placed, along with other quarries now destroyed, in at least three or four windows.

The canopy work of the window appears also to be of the Decorated period. In the upper part of the lower canopies of the middle and eastern lights are oak leaves and acorns, and cups or chalices. On each side of the cup or chalice of the centre light is a hammer. Whether this design is conventional or emblematic I cannot say. Husenbeth, in his Emblems of Saints, mentions the hammer and chalice as emblems of St. Eligius, and two mallets as emblems of St. Denis.

It will be noticed that the border of each of the three lights consists of a narrow strip of plain coloured glass, interspersed with brown squirrels, dolphins, crowns, a double cup or chalice, hazel leaves or sprays, and a heraldic symbol, called a water bouget, which formed part of the armorial bearings of the family of Roos of Hamlake or Hemsley. The east window of Selby Abbey has borders of yellow crowns, squirrels, hazel sprays, and white covered cups. Crowns, covered cups, and vine leaves or hazel leaves, are to be found in some of the borders of windows of All Saints', North Street, York. There is a border of squirrels, vine leaves, and grotesque monsters, in one of the windows of the vestibule to the chapter-house of York Minster; and there are borders of castles, covered cups, and fleur de lis, in the chapter-house and vestibule, also yellow crowns in the borders of two of the nave windows, which I have already mentioned.

The vine leaves and chalice are said by Mr. Westlake (History of Design in Painted Glass, II. 5) to typify the Holy Eucharist; but it seems fairly certain that the covered cups¹ in the windows which I have mentioned are not chalices, but heraldic badges or symbols connected with the province of Galicia, in Spain, which was added to the kingdom of Castile and Leon about the year 1217. Both the covered cups and the castles (which last are not now to be found in Dewsbury borders) are said to have been introduced in honour of Eleanor of Castile, wife of Edward I. of England. The Dean of York, in his Heraldry of York Minster, I. 388-9, shows that Margaret, second wife of Edward I., was entitled to bear not only the arms of France, but also those of Castile and Auvergne, in the latter of which was a dolphin, which will no doubt account for the dolphins in the Dewsbury borders. Probably, also, these borders have had castles, lilies, and other symbols, like the York windows, but have lost them with the other glass which has disappeared. The dolphins and castles appear in the arms of Blanche of Castile in a window in the south aisle (fourth from the east) of the nave of York Minster, which the Dean of York (Heraldry of York Minster, I. 103 and 389) thinks was put in by Archdeacon de Mauley, who held that title from 1289 to 1306. It seems to me that these facts as to the borders of dolphins, &c., in the York windows should confirm the opinion about the date of the Dewsbury glass.

The coats of arms or shields which still remain at Dewsbury are those of Warren at the top and Scargill at the bottom of the western light, Latham at the bottom of the centre light, and Despenser at the top, and St. Martin at the bottom of the eastern light.

Underlying the different colours of these shields, and also very conspicuously in the ruby and green glass of the window, is the beautiful decorative tracery or design which is called diaper, and which was in constant use in the Middle Ages. It is simply an ornamental accessory, of which the Dewsbury glass is a fine example.

The arms of Warren are described as Checky, or and azure; and those of St. Martin are Argent, a bend gules within a bordure goboné or and azure. Watson, in his History of the Earls of Warren and Surrey, I. 5-6, says that the original name of the Earls of Warren was St. Martin, which they dropped on obtaining the title of Earl of Warren in Normandy. Eventually they dropped the shield or escutcheon from their coat of arms, and made the whole shield (instead of merely the border) Checky, or and azure.

The first English Earl of Warren came over with William the Conqueror, and took a leading part in the battle of Hastings. He was liberally rewarded for his great services, and was made Earl of Surrey by William Rufus. He did not own the manor and church of Dewsbury at the date of Domesday-book (about 1080-6), but they were afterwards acquired, either by him or his son, the second earl, by a grant, of which no record now exists. The second earl afterwards granted the church to the monks of the priory of St. Pancras of Lewes by a deed without date, but which must have been executed before the year 1121, because in that year the grant was confirmed by a charter or deed of Ralph, Archbishop of Canterbury, which confirms to the priory of Lewes all its possessions, including the churches of Wakefield and Conisborough, which had been granted to Lewes at the same time and by the same charter as the church of Dewsbury. It is therefore certain that, although the latter church is not mentioned by name in the archbishop's charter, it then belonged to Lewes. The Earls of Warren and Surrey retained their connection with Dewsbury until the death of the eighth earl, about the year 1347, when the lordship of Wakefield, comprising Dewsbury, passed into the hands of his widow, and was afterwards granted by Edward III. to his son, Edward of Langley, Earl of Cambridge. One John de Warren was rector of Dewsbury in 1306; and he is described in a dispensation of Pope Clement as being the illegitimate son of John, formerly Earl of Warren. This would be the seventh earl, who died in 1304. It is very possible that the arms¹ of Warren and St. Martin were placed in Dewsbury church in the time of the above-mentioned John de Warren, rector of Dewsbury, for there are Warren shields in York Minster very similar to that at Dewsbury, which are ascribed to the fourteenth century.

The next arms calling for attention are those of Despenser, which are Quarterly 1 and 4 argent, 2 and 3 gules fretty or, over all a bend sable. The connection of the Despensers with Dewsbury began in the year 1325, when by deed dated 26 July of that year, the prior and convent of Lewes granted to Sir Hugh le Despenser, son of Sir Hugh le Despenser, Earl of Winchester (who was beheaded and attainted in the following year), the advowsons of the churches of Dewsbury and Wakefield, to hold to him for life, with remainder to his son Gilbert, in fee simple. In 1348 a fine was levied in the Court of Common Pleas, in which the king, Edward III., was plaintiff, and Gilbert le Despenser was deforciant, the effect of which was to vest the advowson of Dewsbury in the king, who in the same year gave it to St. Stephen's Chapel at Westminster. As the Despensers were only connected with Dewsbury from 1325 to 1348, it seems reasonable to assume that their coat of arms was placed in the church between those dates.

The next coat of arms is that of Scargill, which is Ermine, a saltire gules. This family sprang from the place of the same name, in the parish of Barningham, in North Yorkshire. They had an estate at Lede Grange, in the parish of Ryther, near the site of the battle of Towton. The will of Thomas Skargell, of Lede, Esquire, is printed in the second volume of the Yorkshire Wills, published by the Surtees Society, and is dated 12 March, 1432. The will of his wife, Johanna Skargill, dated 3 February, 1422, is printed on page 402 of the York Wills, Vol. I. (Surtees Society). The Scargills also had considerable property in Wakefield and Ossett (Dodsworth's Yorkshire Notes, 110-11). William de Scargill was steward of the manor of Wakefield, 22 Edward III. (Dodsworth MSS., cXL, 45 and 45b); and at a court of the manor, held 6 December, 27 Edward III. (1353), John, son of William de Skargill, of Ossett, did fealty for lands in Wakefield and Ossett. On the 16 October, 1446, the Archbishop of York granted an oratory to Roger Scargill, of Batley, who appears to have been brother of the above-named Thomas Skargell, of Lede.

The remaining coat of arms is that of Latham, which is Or, on a chief indented azure, three plates. I have hitherto been unable to trace the connection of this family with Dewsbury. The arms of Latham are in Selby Abbey Church; and in the fifteenth century John Latham founded the chantry of St. Catharine there (Morrell's Selby, 103-4). See his will, Test. Ebor., III., 173-8.

We now come to the two figures of saints (unfortunately both headless) which still remain in the Dewsbury window. These are St. Thomas of Canterbury and St. Thaddeus, otherwise called St. Jude. They are thought to be of early fourteenth century date, and probably formed part of a window composed of such figures. I do not know any special reason why the figure of St. Jude should be placed in Dewsbury Church, unless it is one of a set of the twelve apostles. The case is different with regard to St. Thomas of Canterbury. He was martyred 29th December, 1170, and canonised by Pope Alexander III. 12th March, 1172-3. His memory was held in such veneration throughout Christendom that his figure, and scenes from his martyrdom, were soon to be found depicted in many churches, and in missals, breviaries, etc. These memorials have now nearly all disappeared, in consequence of the decree of Henry VIII., about the year 1538, "that Thomas à Becket was no saint, but a rebel and a traitor; that he should no longer be called or esteemed a saint; that all images and pictures of him should be destroyed, all festivals held in his honour should be abolished, and his name and remembrance erased from all documents, under pain of royal indignation, and imprisonment during his grace's pleasure." Mrs. Jameson (Legends of the Monastic Orders) says that this decree was so effective that the effigies of this once-beloved and popular saint vanished at once from every house and oratory. His portrait was even smeared over and obliterated in missals and breviaries. His effigy is therefore now very seldom met with in England. Other figures of St. Thomas in thirteenth century stained glass may be seen in Trinity Chapel at Canterbury Cathedral, where are three windows devoted to the miracles of Becket; and on a medallion in one of the windows is a representation of Becket's shrine, with the martyr issuing from it in full pontificals. In Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford, is shewn the murder of Becket in fourteenth century glass, with the archbishop kneeling before the altar of St. Benedict. In Lincoln Cathedral are fragments of medallions in stained glass, which Mr. Westlake, in his History of Design in Painted Glass, Vol. I., p. 116, says are of about the same date as most of the Canterbury glass. These medallions illustrate the life of St. Thomas, and one of them represents the saint escorted by angels, who present him at the gate of heaven. He carries the upper part of his head in his hands as his passport and the sign of his martyrdom. There was formerly a chapel in York Minster dedicated to St. Thomas of Canterbury, but this has now disappeared. It occupied the second bay of the north aisle of the nave, where is now the celebrated bell-founder's window.¹ It is probably owing to the above-mentioned decree of Henry VIII. that the Dewsbury figure of St. Thomas disappeared for so many years, and now only exists in a headless state. The figure was discovered by Mr. Knowles when he rearranged the glass and placed it in its present position. That gentleman says that the drapery shows the alb, the dalmatic, the stole, and part of a cope; also that there are the gold shoes, and part of a pastoral staff.

With regard to the three medallions or roundels in the lower part of the Dewsbury window, I cannot do better than quote an extract from the late Mr. James Fowler's article on "Mediaeval Representations of the months and seasons," published in Archæologia, Vol. 44 :—

"In the rose windows of our great churches of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, it is stated by Viollet le Duc : Dict. de l'Architecture de France, Art : Zodiaque, that zodiacs are of frequent occurrence. I am not myself aware of any such in England ; but there are three small medallions in Dewsbury Church, Yorkshire, which appear to have belonged to a set of either months or seasons of the year,—it is now difficult to say which. They belong to the fourteenth century,—I believe about to the end of the first quarter. Assuming that they belonged to a set representing originally the four seasons of the year, they may be described as follows :—

"Winter.—A man in shoes and hosen, with a loosely-fitting tunic, confined at the waist by the belt, killing a pig ; the animal's head fastened by its snout to the stump of a tree, and the fore and hinder feet pressed firmly forward, as though striving to get loose, and the mouth partly open, as though in the act of screaming ; the man's arms thrown back and holding an axe, with the back of which he is in the act of striking the animal's neck : two sprays of foliage behind.

"Spring (wanting).

"Summer.—A man dressed like the last, except that he has no belt, treading on the stubble of ground already cleared, grasping with his left hand a bunch of corn standing in full ear before him, and cutting it with a sickle, having a rough or toothed edge, held in the right hand.

"Autumn.—A man dressed like the last, threshing some sheaves of corn, which lie before him, with a flail. The yellow grains of corn are flying from the ears, and in the background are his 'forenoon' or 'afternoon drinkings,' as they are still called in the West Riding of Yorkshire, in a jug, kept from becoming flat by the cup which stands on the top."

Mr. Westlake gives these three roundels, with others, in a page of illustrations (page 144 of his third volume), and he appears to consider them of the fifteenth century ; but he is not very clear in his remarks, and he evidently has not seen the glass, as he does not mention it by name, merely classing it under the comprehensive term of "elsewhere," after mentioning those in the mayor's parlour at Leicester, which to me do not appear nearly so fine as those at Dewsbury.

There are three other roundels in the Dewsbury window. The one in the right-hand light has the hairy body and legs of an animal with cloven feet, wings somewhat resembling those of a bat, and the head of a woman, wearing a kerchief which appears to be of fourteenth century fashion. The figure is enclosed in a quatrefoil; and I therefore suggest that it also is of the Decorated period, probably early fourteenth century.

In the left-hand light is another roundel, containing some kind of bird-like monster, which may be intended for a cockatrice or wyvern, whatever such fabulous beings may be. This roundel is surrounded by a border differing in pattern from the border of the roundel in the right-hand light. I am not sufficiently expert to hazard an opinion as to the date of this roundel, nor yet as to the date of that in the centre light, which contains two figures: that on the left being a female playing on a harp of six strings, which is ornamented with the head of some animal on the upper part of the framework. Behind the woman is a figure which has puzzled me for many years. It has the head and body of a human being, with a flat or close-fitting cap covering the ears. The lower part has the two hind-legs and tail of a beast, and curiously enough, they are turned the wrong way,—that is, the face looks over the tail, which reaches to the mouth.

At the top of the centre light of the window is what seems to be another roundel, but it is merely a group of fragments arranged by Mr. Knowles at the restoration in 1887. It comprises emblems of three evangelists,—St. Matthew, St. Luke, and St. John,—which may be of the fifteenth century, as they are very like some glass of that date in the east window of the north aisle of Holy Trinity Church, Goodramgate, York. There is also the figure of a man having the tonsure, who appears to be about to play on an organ. This personage has a dress or skirt of feathers; and it may be that we are to assume that he has become an angel. Then there are the battlements and gate of a castle with portcullis, which appear to have formed part of a border.

The four evangelists were favourite figures with the designers of stained glass windows of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Sometimes each figure is given in a separate roundel or medallion (Westlake, III. 142–3), and sometimes all the four figures are grouped together. At the church of Chartham in Kent (Westlake, II. 16) is a quatrefoil arrangement in fourteenth century glass, having a centre containing the figure of Our Lord in majesty, whilst the four evangelists occupy the four foils.

In Mrs. Jameson's work on Sacred and Legendary Art, Vol. I., will be found a most interesting account of the four evangelists and their emblems, and the various legends and traditions concerning them.

We learn from this book that the earliest type under which the evangelists were figured was that of four scrolls (representing the four gospels) in the four angles of a Greek cross. The second type was that of the four rivers having their source in Paradise; and the third and more lasting and favourite type was that of the four mysterious creatures in the vision of Ezekiel (chap. i. 5 and following verses), and the four beasts in the Book of Revelation (chap. iv. 7). This type is mentioned as early as the second century; but it was not until the fifth century that these symbols are found assuming a visible form, and introduced into works of art.

1. To St. Matthew was given the cherub or human semblance, because he begins his gospel with the human generation of Christ; or, according to others, because in his gospel the human nature of the Saviour is more insisted on than the divine. In the most ancient mosaics (dating back to the fifth century) the type is human, not angelic, for the head is that of a man with a beard. It will be noticed that St. Matthew's head in the Dewsbury window is that of a man with a beard.

2. St. Mark (whose figure is wanting at Dewsbury) has the lion, because he has set forth the royal dignity of Christ; or, according to others, because he begins with the mission of the Baptist,—“the voice of one crying in the wilderness,”—which is figured by the lion; or, according to a third interpretation, the lion was allotted to St. Mark because there was in the Middle Ages a popular belief that the young of the lion was born dead, and after three days was awakened to vitality by the breath of its sire. Some writers, however, represent the lion as vivifying his young, not by his breath, but by his roar. In either case the application is the same; the revival of the young lion was considered symbolical of the Resurrection, and St. Mark was commonly called the “Historian of the Resurrection.” Another commentator remarks that St. Mark begins his gospel with roaring—“The voice of one crying in the wilderness”; and ends it fearfully with a curse—“He that believeth not shall be damned,”—and that therefore his appropriate attribute is the most terrible of beasts, the lion.

3. St. Luke has the ox, because he has dwelt on the priesthood of Christ, the ox being the emblem of sacrifice.

4. St. John has the eagle, which is the symbol of the highest inspiration, because he soared upwards to the contemplation of the divine nature of the Saviour.

Above the heads of the saints will be noticed a line reaching across the window of heads of human beings and animals. In the left-hand light are two tonsured heads, a youth and a griffin; in the centre light are the head of a man wearing a helmet with the visor up, and a lion's head; in the right-hand light are a woman's head, with a scourge, a child piping, a hound with collar, and the horned head of some grotesque animal or dragon. Beneath these figures are a quatrefoil, which was an early English design, two cinquefoils, and what appear to be the battlements of a castle. Some of the heads are inserted in quatrefoils and the helmet or bascinet which I have mentioned seems to be of early fourteenth century date. The only remaining portion of the glass which I need mention is the middle part of the centre light, consisting of fragments of beautiful diapered green and ruby glass.

In conclusion, I venture to express the hope that the old painted glass in Yorkshire churches will receive more attention in the near future than has hitherto been the case. It would be a very creditable work for the Yorkshire Archæological Society to undertake and complete a description of such glass. So long ago as July, 1846, the late Mr. C. Winston suggested at the York meeting of the Archæologica Institute "that a good catalogue of the York glass would be an achievement worthy of the Institute." That achievement has not yet been accomplished; and in the meantime the number of York churches has been reduced, and unless some urgently-needed repairs are quickly executed, another York church (Holy Trinity, Goodramgate) will be in ruins, and its beautiful fourteenth and fifteenth century glass will run great risk of destruction, unless it is protected by removal to the Minster, or other safe quarters.

With regard to the illustrations of the Dewsbury window, I have to say that the collotypes have been taken from drawings made some years ago by an assistant of Mr. Knowles, of York.

the parishes of Rufforth, Marstone and other therabouts; and especiallie upon one Sonday or holliday, in his dauncing or after, wantonlye and dissolutelye, he kissed a mayd or yong woman then a daunser in his companie, wherat divers persons were offended and so sore greved that there was wepons drawn, and great dissention arose, as was lyke to aryse therupon, to the great disquietnes of Gode's peace and the Quene maties, and to the great perill and daunger of his soull, etc.

In answer to this he says that he has "dyvers and sundry tymes in the tymes of Christenmas and harvest daunced emonges other honest yonge companye both att Mr. Gale's house in Rufforde parishe, and at Mr. Lougher's hous in Marston parishe, but not immodestlye."

That the said Tristrame upon a Sonday or holliday did not onelye permit and suffer a rish-bearing within the churche and church-yard of Rufforth, wherat was used much lewde, light and unsemelye dauncinges and gestures, very unfit for thes places, but also he hymselfe at the said rish-bearing very unsemelye did daunce, skip, leape and hoighe, gallantlye, as he thought in his owne folishe and lewde concepte, in the said church-yarde emongest a great multitude of people, wher he was deryded, flowted and laughed at.

In answer he says "Ther was a rishe-bearinge at Rufforde churche for the decency of the churche, and at that tyme he gave in chardge that neyther pypynge nor dauncinge should be used in the church or church yeard, as in dede ther was not to his sight or knowledge."

That the said Tristram hath not had and used decent apparell and sqware cap lyke a minister of his vocation and according to the lawes ecclesiasticall of this realme, but hath worne and had most comonlye a long sword and round cloke, lyke to a ruffyn or serving man. And by all the said tyme hath bene and yet is a comon haunter and user of aylehouses, and a comon player at unlawfull games in unlawfull tymes and places.

In answer he says "he doth not usually weare a square cappe, yet he hath one and weareth it on princypall feastes, as Christenmas-day and Easter day; and he weareth when he rydeth or goeth abrode a round cloke without sleeves. . . . decent, as he beleveth."

That the said Tristrame upon Sonday last, being the second day of Julye [1581], had two cures to discharge within the dioces of Yorke, in both which places he was bound to say divine service the same day, which he left undone and unsaid in both places, and did exercise hymselfe all the fore none and the afternone, or the most parte therof, the same day in bowlinge at Marstone, even in the tyme of Divine service, most contrarie to his vocation and calling.

In answer he says "that on Sonday last he had two cures to serve, viz., Kyrkby Wharfe and Rufforde, wherat he was to say Devyne service; he did it at Rufforde hymselfe, both mornynge and evenynge prayer, and at Kyrkby by one sir Thomas Gregson, his curate ther for that tyme."—"On Sonday last, a litle before supper and after supper, he bowled at Marston with Mr. Gayle and other honest companye."

That by reason of the premisses the said Tristrame hath bene and yet is greatlie and vehementlie suspected to be a Papist or mislyker of religion now established within this realme.

14th July, 1581. William Jackson, of Acomb, husbandman, says,— he sawe Tristrame Tyldesley, clerke, daunce emonges yonge men and yonge women after a pyper upon a Sondag in the after none about a yere ago in Rufforde towne gate. It was on a rishe-bearinge day. Upon a Sondag within nyght about eleven a clocke and after in somer last he sawe him daunce at a weddinge at William Hunter's hous in Rufforde emonges many yonge folkes, both men and women, when the brydegroome and bryde were in bedd, and they were come from the weddinge hous to the said Hunter's hous, beinge an ale hous, when the said Trystrame was so lusty in his dauncinge that eyther he kyssed or offered to kysse the said Hunter's doughter, a yonge woman; and a yonge felowe who kyssed her was beaten on the face by sir Trystrame or by some other standinge by; but, as he remembreth, it was sir Trystrame, so that dyvers swordes were drawne and a great tumulte had lyke to have bene: which all was begonne and sett on by the said Trystrame, of his owne sight and hearinge.

He denies this.

He hath bene a lusty dauncinge preist, and offensyve to many both by his dauncinge and swashing in apparell, not minister lyke.

Thomas Smyth, of Acomb, labourer, says—that upon a Sondag in the afternoone, being a rish-bearinge day at Rufforde, in somer last past, he sawe Trystrame Tyldesley daunce verie lustilye emonges yonge folkes, bothe women and men, in his cote or dublett and hose, very unsemely; and they daunced dyvers daunces; and one daunce emonges other was a man fetchd in a woman and putt his hat on her heade and kissed her; and she fetchd in a man in like maner, and so till ther was a great company both of men and women which daunced hande in hande; emonges whome the said Trystrame Tyldesley was one, and had in eyther hand a woman, and daunced rounde with th'other company, and hoyghed as they dyd, which was much noted and marked, and was very offensyve to those that sawe him.

BRASS AT DARRINGTON, NEAR PONTEFRACT.

By RICHARD HOLMES.

A very fine brass is affixed to one of the pillars of the north arcade of Darrington church, mention of which has been unfortunately omitted on page 14. The William Farrer, whose inscription is there given, was the father of the second Mrs. Grenewood, of Stapleton Hall, who had married James, the son and heir of the James Grenewood whose inscription is below, and it was while on a visit to his daughter in 1684, that Squire Farrer sickened for death.

Mr. Grenewood's plate is of fine proportions (10½ in. × 7 in.), and the inscription is between two incised columns, each surmounted by an urn, and connected with each other by a semi-circular wreath. Occupying the arc is a handsome coat of arms with crest.

Crest: A demi-lion rampant, couped, holding a saltire.

Arms: (Sable); a chevron (ermine) between three saltires (argent), two and one. On an escutcheon, a chevron charged with ermine, between three church bells, two and one.

Inscription: Here are conserved the remaines of James Grenewood, of Stapleton, Gent., who by Mary his wife, daughter & co-heir of Francis Belhouse, of Newsom, Gent., had 9 children of whom 6
sones survive, viz., James · Fra · Hen · Jo · Cha · & Will · He dyed the 13 of October in the 67 yeare of his age A D 1670.

By his industrious providence and mirit,
Affable temper, & peace-making spirit,
Fatherly care, conjugall love vnstained
A good repute & precious memory he gained.

THE CISTERCIAN ORDER.

By J. T. MICKLETHWAITE, V.P.S.A.

OF MONACHISM IN ENGLAND.

THE idea of the monastic life is that a man who enters it shall give up all share and interest in the affairs of this world, and from that time live only for the service of God and of religion. Every creed definite enough to excite a real faith in its followers has produced its monks. The Jews and pagans of antiquity had them, and there are now probably more Buddhist and Moslem monks in Asia than there were at any time Christian ones in Europe. There have been different forms of self-sacrifice. Some have sought it in bodily hardship, with study and the constant attention to the offices of their religion. Others have seen the service of God in ministering to the needs of their fellow-men. Some have, as far as they could, withdrawn themselves from human society, seeking in solitude to be alone with God. Others have gathered into companies, having all things in common, and vowed obedience to their ruler. It is these last who have made the history of Monachism. The solitary died and left nothing behind him except, perhaps, a local memory of his holiness. But communities have lived on for centuries and become settled institutions. They have grown rich and powerful, and little by little the hardness of the first life has been softened down till only the form of it has remained. Monachism, instead of a sacrifice, has become a profession; and the cloister, instead of a refuge for humility, has become a pathway for ambition. Where the old faith has survived there have been earnest men who have sought for reforms and a return to the strictness of the old life; and to this end they have sometimes formed new societies, destined only to repeat the story of the old.

The succession of the Christian monastic orders in western Europe begins with that founded by St. Benedict at Monte Cassino at the beginning of the sixth century. There were Christian monks long before him, and after him many who did not recognise him as their father. But it seems that by the end of the tenth century all the older communities had either ceased to be monastic or accepted the Benedictine rule. Although the ordinary history books make it appear that we English received our Christianity from Augustine the Benedictine monk, the real hard work of converting, not England only, but of the greater part of northern and central Europe, was done by men, monks indeed, but who knew not Benedict. Their traditions came from Ireland, and ultimately, without doubt, from the ancient British church. These had a share in the formation of the traditions of the Church of England, notwithstanding the acceptance of the Italian customs on the points disputed between the rival parties at the Conference of Whitby in 664. How large this share was is shewn by the fact that the Conference itself, called under Italian influence and attended by a high ecclesiastic sent for the purpose from Rome, of which city he seems to have soon after become bishop, was held in a monastery the existence of which would have seemed a scandal in the eyes of St. Benedict. The monastery of Whitby was a great religious family of persons of both sexes, and it was ruled over by a woman. There were many such in England; and as the manner of life in them seems to have been settled in each case by the head of the house, it was natural that as time went on whatever strictness of rule there may have been at the beginning was relaxed in many of them, until nothing monastic remained except the name, and a minster came to mean a church served by a body of secular and often married clergy.¹

These first English monasteries were founded in the seventh and eighth centuries, and scarcely any of them escaped destruction from the heathen Danes in the ninth and tenth. The invaders plundered and burned the buildings, and often murdered all the inmates. The minsters in the cities were the more protected from harm, and when they suffered, their importance and the numbers of men interested in them caused them to be repaired quickly, and their traditions to remain unbroken. The chapters of York and London, and some other cathedral churches of the old foundation, may claim a regular descent through twelve or thirteen centuries. But the minsters in exposed and remote situations seem seldom to have been restored. The throne, and each of which now gives a title to a bishop, three being the heads of sees, though one of them, by a strange blunder which ought soon to be corrected, has been transferred to the province of Canterbury.

churches, or parts of them, were generally patched up again by the neighbours for their own use, and became parish churches, which many are to this day. Some afterwards became the sites of abbeys and colleges, which, to make boast of their antiquity, might profess to be the same as the old monasteries. But they were really new foundations, whose only connection with the old lay in the fact that they occupied their places and enjoyed or claimed their property and privileges. The plundering Danes could not take the lands away with them. And although in times of confusion there was without doubt much usurpation, the principle that the lands still belonged to the churches was admitted. And the fact that a church had enough of them to support a college or a convent was often the moving cause of one being settled there. But the founder in such a case acted only as a patron bestowing a benefice in his gift upon a community instead of upon an individual parson, and not with any idea that he was restoring the church to its former status.

It is impossible to say whether an effective monastic discipline was kept up in any English monastery at the beginning of the tenth century, although the secularising movement must have gone less far in some than in others. But after the victories of Alfred had given comparative peace to the country, and things social and ecclesiastical were getting back again into their natural order, there were men who were dissatisfied with what they found, and sought for something better. And it was then that the rule of St. Benedict was first imposed upon English monasteries. This was a reform, and it is associated with the name of St. Dunstan, Archbishop of Canterbury, and himself a monk, who was the chief promoter of it.

The real history of the monastic orders in England begins with the establishment of the Benedictine rule here in the middle of the tenth century. It was so generally accepted that all old English monasteries that survived as monasteries until the end of the next century had become Benedictine. The others were and professed to be secular, and the attempts made with varying success by some bishops as late as the twelfth century to replace them by regulars, were a continuation of the policy begun by Dunstan.

Besides the older monasteries, such new monasteries as were founded here up to nearly the end of the eleventh century were Benedictine. But then such foundations ceased, and the later ones belong to the reformed Benedictines, who used other names to distinguish themselves; to the orders of Regular Canons, black and white, and then to the various orders of friars and some others each in its turn, according to the fashion of the day, for it is evident by the dates of the foundations that fashion had much to do with them.

The ascetic life was much respected in the Middle Ages, and each new "religion" appealed to popular favour by its superior hardness of life, often very real at first, but seldom long maintained.¹

There is no reason for doubting that the Benedictine houses established here under Dunstan were well ordered, and the rule properly kept in them. But it was already so far relaxed in some abbeys abroad that a desire for reform and a stricter observance was growing up amongst the more earnest monks. The great religious movement which produced the first Crusade was accompanied by a vast wave of monastic enthusiasm. New abbeys arose all over western Europe in numbers, which, but that the record of them remains, would be incredible, and were filled with men² from all classes of society more quickly than they could be built.

There was a corresponding growth amongst the regular canons, whose history runs parallel with that of the monks. I do not intend to follow it out now, but it may be convenient to the reader to have the distinction between them and the monks pointed out. The canons really were monks according to the definition of the monastic life with which I began, but they differed from those to whom the name was commonly given in that they were men in orders, whilst in the days when Monachism was at its best, the monks were laymen associated together for the service of God, and having amongst them only priests enough to minister to them in holy things. Benedict himself was never ordained, but in aftertimes it became the custom for an abbot to receive priest's orders on his election, if he had not them before. It was not until Monachism was in decay, and monks were few, that it became usual for them to be priests. There was a large number of houses of Regular Canons, but they were smaller than those of the monks. They traced their origin to St. Augustine of Hippo, and followed a rule which bears his name.

The new abbeys founded in England at the end of the eleventh and during the twelfth century were still Benedictine,³ but the latest

² In the Early and Middle Ages it was chiefly men who sought the religious life. There were indeed always convents of women, but they were few by comparison with those of the men, and generally very small. I doubt whether any English community of religious women in the Middle Ages ever equalled in numbers those to be found at East Grinstead and three or four other places to-day.

purely Benedictine abbeys in England were, I believe, Battle, founded in 1067, and Selby, founded in 1069. The others were Benedictine and something more. They belonged to the orders with new names, which had grown out of attempts made in different places to return to a stricter monastic discipline. Of these by far the most important were the Cluniac and the Cistercian. The Cluniac was the earlier, having grown out of a reform made in the Abbey of Cluny by the abbot Odo, who was afterwards canonised.

One great cause of decay in the older Benedictine houses, and particularly in the smaller ones, had been their independence; and abbot Odo, in restoring a good rule of life to his monks, provided for its maintenance by making all the monasteries which accepted his rule into one family. They were made, not abbeys, but priories, and regarded as members of the mother house, to which all the monks belonged, and the abbot of Cluny governed all.

The first Cluniac foundation in England was at Lewes in 1078, and for nearly fifty years from that date Cluniac priories continued to be founded here. But then the fashion changed, and the new foundations were of the Cistercian order, which was begun in 1098, and though slower in making its way at first than its rival, ended by greatly surpassing it both in the extent and rapidity of its growth.

Several causes helped this change in popular favour. The Cluniac system tended to the impoverishment of the dependent houses, both in men and means, for the aggrandisement of Cluny itself; and founders who had intended to establish important religious centres upon their own property were dissatisfied when they found that a large part of the revenue which they had bestowed was taken away out of the country. The Cistercian system of affiliation which will be described in another chapter, whilst it equally linked all together into one family, and provided for the regular visitation of each house by some one with authority to enquire into and correct abuses, left to each house the management of its own affairs, and each was represented by its abbot in the general chapter which legislated for the whole order.

The first English Cistercian house was founded at Waverley in Surrey in 1128. In the next year the order was introduced into Yorkshire by the foundation of Rievaulx Abbey; and the dates of nearly all the other Cistercian abbeys in England come within about a dozen years after that. The growth had been as quick in other countries, and the monks themselves seem to have felt that it had gone far enough; for in 1152 the general chapter ruled that no more new abbeys should be founded.

About the time that Cistercian foundations ceased there was brought into England the order of Premonstratensian or White Canons, whose place amongst the canons corresponded closely with that of the Cistercians amongst the monks, and the most important new foundations of the latter half of the twelfth century belonged to them. After that the new foundations were very few, and those chiefly of a special character, such as the house of Sion and several Carthusian priories. There was indeed no need for more. The fierce religious zeal of the first half of the century which had culminated in St. Bernard, began to cool down soon after his death. Cloisters which had been crowded with monks were so no longer, and soon the need was to be not for more monasteries, but for men to fill those that there were.

The establishment of the friars in the thirteenth century also helped to prevent further development of Monachism here by drawing off men who might otherwise have become monks. But the effective cause was a change in society itself, and the result would have come if Francis and Dominic had never been. The abbey of the twelfth century were the work of a comparatively small aristocracy into whose hands the wealth of the country was accumulated, and a great landowner might have other motives besides those of religion in founding one. It was a matter of pride to be patron of an abbey, and the neighbourhood of one was often an improvement to the surrounding property. But when there had grown up an independent and well-to-do middle class, their interests were not in the abbey, but in their own parish churches, upon the maintenance and improvement of which they spent freely, according to their means. To a citizen or a franklin the monk was a dignitary; but the parish priest was his neighbour and friend, and the parish church was his own, and his credit was concerned in the decent keeping of it. The friars, too, were esteemed by the people because they were themselves of the people, lived amongst them and shared their interests.

The old abbey had their own property to maintain them. Some were wealthy and some poor, and there is no reason for doubting that most of the monks were respectable and pious men to the end, although their numbers were small and their rule generally very differently kept from what it had been in the days of fervour. The suppression of the English monasteries was the work of knaves, whose only object was plunder, and whose hypocritical pretences only make them the more despicable. There is no doubt, however, that a very large reduction of their number would, if honestly carried out, have been a salutary measure. There were far more monasteries in England than were needed or could be properly used. But the entire removal of the monastic life from the English Church has been a loss and a source of weakness which men at last are beginning to understand and put right. There always have been and always must be in the church men whose bent is towards the religious life. And for want of opportunity to enter it, earnest men who might have been great religious reformers have sometimes, even in spite of themselves, sunk to be the founders of new sects.

SECTION II.

OF THE CISTERCIAN ORDER.

NEAR the end of the eleventh century certain monks of the Abbey of Molesme in Burgundy, professing obedience to the rule of St. Benedict, but according to their own judgment, far removed from the practice of it, determined to make an effort to restore the ancient discipline. The attempt was not made at home; and although we are not told the reason, we may fairly believe that it was because the reformers were but a party amongst the monks, and there was another and perhaps larger party, which was content with things as they were, and whose vested interest in the abbey, and moral right to resist the imposition of a stricter rule than that which they had voluntarily undertaken, were respected.

The abbot Robert was of the reforming party, and he, with twenty others, having obtained what they deemed a necessary licence from Hugh, archbishop of Lyons¹ and papal legate, left their home at Molesme and set out to seek another in 1098. They found what they thought a fit place in a wild wood at Citeaux, and having obtained the leave of the owner,² soon cleared the ground and built there a wooden monastery, where other monks like-minded with themselves joined them; and Robert having received the crosier from the bishop of the diocese, became abbot of what was to grow into one of the most famous abbeys in the world.

But soon a trouble arose. The men of Molesme wanted to have their old abbot back again, saying that without him they had no hope of restoring peace and quietness, or of bringing back the observance of the rule to its ancient strictness. This is interesting, because it shows that after the withdrawal of the Cistercians there still remained earnest religious men at Molesme, who though not prepared to go out with their brethren, wished for a reasonable measure of reform at home. It also shows that the laxity which had caused the exodus was not of a very serious kind,¹ or the home-stayers would not have wished to be again under the rule of the reforming abbot.

In obedience to the papal decision, Robert went back to Molesme, and the Cistercians chose in his place Alberic their prior, who was one of the original twenty colonists.

Abbot Alberic ruled nine years and a half. In his time the abbey was made independent of all authority except that of the Pope. And the life in it began to take that form which was soon to make its name famous, although for a time the hardness of it seems to have frightened away recruits, and the monks began to fear that there would be none to carry it on after them.

The next abbot was Stephen Harding, an Englishman, born at Sherborne in Dorset, and also one of the twenty. He was the real founder of the Cistercian order. Before he ruled it, Cîteaux had been but one of the youngest and poorest amongst many Benedictine abbeys. He left it the head of an organization which in a very few years spread itself all over and even beyond western christendom, and became the most powerful of all monastic orders.

The first settlers at Cîteaux professed no rule of life except that of St. Benedict, and differed from other monks of their time only in their zeal for exact obedience to it. They rejected evident deviation from the letter of the rule and all superfluities which seemed to contradict its spirit. But the positive side of their reform grew out of experience, and took shape only after trial.

crimes. Protestant writers who begin with the assumption that monasteries were the centres of every form of iniquity often deceive themselves by taking such denunciations literally. Amongst so many as the monks were, there were of course some bad men, but the rule they lived under was a great check on such, and real offences were promptly and severely dealt with.

In 1109, when Stephen became abbot, Cîteaux was still in its tentative and almost hopeless period, but the change was near. In 1113 a new abbey was begun at La Ferté, and colonised by monks from Cîteaux, and within three years three more were established at Pontigny, Morimond, and Clairvaux. These four with Cîteaux itself became the principal abbeys of the order, and certain special duties and privileges were assigned to them. When the Exordium was written, which seems to have been about 1120, the number of Cistercian houses had grown to twelve, and in 1152, when the general chapter thought it wise to forbid any further increase, they had reached the almost incredible number of three hundred and thirty.

The special character of the Cistercian order was due to the constitution which bound these abbeys together. It is called the "Charter of Charity"—*Carta Karitatis*¹—and is not dated; but the prologus to it tells us that it was drawn up by abbot Stephen and his brethren before Cistercian abbeys had begun to flourish—antequam abbatie Cistercienses florere inciperent. The document itself, however, shows that there must already have been a considerable number of them, and it can not have been written long before 1119, when it received papal confirmation.

The Carta Karitatis begins by saying that the abbot and brethren of Cîteaux make no exaction of worldly goods from the daughter houses. Then it enjoins upon all the observance of the rule of St. Benedict in all things as it is observed at Cîteaux itself, without putting a forced meaning on any passage in it.² The use of Cîteaux was also to be followed by all in their church books, ceremonial and customs. The relation of the different abbeys one to another and the system of government for the whole order is next described. The abbeys which had been colonised from Cîteaux were its daughter houses, and the abbot of Cîteaux was called their father abbot. Once in a year he was personally or by deputy to visit each and to make enquiry as to its state and order, and in case of evident incompetence or moral unfitness to rule, he had power to depose the abbot and to direct the election of another. The daughter houses of Cîteaux bore the same relation to their colonies, and they again to theirs. And Cîteaux itself was to be visited by the four "first abbots," who were those of La Ferté, Pontigny, Clairvaux and Morimond, who were to go together and personally, not being allowed to appoint other abbots their deputies as other father abbots were. Thus it was provided that every house in the order should be regularly visited, and a check was put upon the growth of local customs such as had changed the character of many independent Benedictine abbeys.

¹The Carta Karitatis is printed in Yorks. Arch. Journal, IX., pp. 234-239, and there is an earlier text in Guignard, pp. 79-84, and in the new edition of the Nomasticon.

²"Non alium inducant sensum in lectionem Sancte Regule, sed sicut antecessores nostri . . . intellexerunt et tenuerunt, et nos hodie intelligimus et tenemus, ita et isti intelligant et teneant."

The whole order was governed by the general chapter, which met every year at Cîteaux, or for sufficient cause in some other abbey. The general chapter was an assembly of the abbots, and all were bound to attend every year, except some who by reason of the extreme remoteness of their houses might do so at longer intervals. Thus the Cistercian order was made one, not by the subjection of all to a common head, as in that of Cluny, but by the federation of abbeys, each free in the management of its own affairs, and each having an equal share in the legislation which was to govern all.¹

This system, organized by Stephen Harding, continued in work for a long time. It did not prevent degradation as monastic fervour cooled, but it certainly retarded it, and a good deal of the old severity remained in the Cistercian life even to the end of Monachism in England, beyond which we are not now concerned.

As by the Charter of Charity all Cistercian houses were bound to observe in all things the manner of life kept at Cîteaux, some written code was necessary, and one was drawn up accordingly. It was not called a rule; the rule was that of St. Benedict, and this new document laid down for the guidance of others what were the "Customs" (consuetudines) whereby St. Benedict's rule was interpreted and kept in the Abbey of Cîteaux. The Customs being a necessary complement to the Charter of Charity, were most likely committed to writing about the same time that it was. The earliest text is that printed by Guignard from a MS. of the latter half of the twelfth century.

The general chapter, as occasion called, made "Statutes" (instituta) for the further guidance of the order, and from time to time these were collected and codified. The different collections shew in detail how the Cistercian life was gradually changed as years went on. One of them, made in 1257, with additional statutes passed by the general chapter during the next thirty years, has been edited for the Yorkshire Archæological Journal by the Rev. Canon Fowler, F.S.A., and it is very interesting to compare it with the earlier collection printed by Guignard. It will be necessary to say something about the changes later on. But first I will try to describe the life as we find it laid down in the Customs and the earliest Statutes.

We learn from the Exordium that already in the time of abbot Stephen, and apparently before the growth of the order had begun, he with his brethren of Cîteaux had made for themselves a law to reject everything in their church, and in the manner of conducting the services there, which, as they thought, savoured of pride and superfluity. Their crosses were not to be of gold or silver, but only of painted wood ; their one only candlestick was to be of iron, and the censers only of copper or iron. Their chasubles were to be of fustian or linen, without ornament of silk gold or silver ; albes and amices to be of linen only, and plain. Copes and dalmatics were rejected altogether. Only the stoles and fanons might be of silk, and they without gold or silver. The chalices were not to be of gold, but of silver, which might, however, be gilt ; and the pipe, then used for communion from the chalice, was to be of silver. The altar cloths were to be of linen without ornament, and the crewets not of gold or silver. We learn from the Customs that the services of the Cistercians were as severely simple as their ornaments, and both were in strong contrast with those of the monks of Cluny, who, whilst keeping up the monastic discipline in their lives, acted upon the principle that nothing is too good or too costly to offer to God, and made their churches and services as splendid and stately as it was in their power to do. The two orders in the twelfth century represented two opposite schools, which have always been in the Church, and probably always will be.

By the rule of St. Benedict the monk's time was divided between prayer and work, and there has always been a tendency to substitute literary for manual work. But the reformers of Cîteaux gave much importance to manual labour, and ascribed to it a dignity almost equal to that of the Church's offices, which indeed were at times allowed to give place to it. The idea that the work of a man's hands was as acceptable an offering to God as the recitation of the offices in church, without doubt helped much to the vast and rapid growth of the Cistercian order in the twelfth century.

Only men who could read were able to take part in the offices of the quire, for although it seems to have been common for men to know the psalter by heart, there were parts in the service which could not be followed without book. Christian Monachism had grown up in a state of society in which reading was not a rare accomplishment. Even in St. Benedict's days the culture of classic times was not extinct in Italy, and ignorance of letters was probably not commoner there than it was in England a hundred years since, and he had no difficulty about the maintenance of the constant round of praise and prayer which was one of the ideals of a monk's life.¹

Things were very different at the end of the eleventh century. A great intellectual revival had indeed begun, and the new monastic orders were one of the signs of it. But letters were almost confined to professional clerks, and there were numbers of men of high social standing and great ability in affairs who were nevertheless unable to read. And in an age of religious fervour it was natural that there should be many amongst them who felt the call to devote their lives wholly to the service of God. For such the Cistercian polity found a place. The Cistercian conversi or lay brethren were as truly monks as they to whom the name monachi was generally given. They took the same vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. They were members of the same brotherhood; and although the nature of their service kept them apart during life, in death they were equal, and the same rites were accorded to all. However it may have been in later times, so long as the Cistercian life kept its first severity, there were men amongst the conversi as well or better born than any of the monks.² But the extinction of all social difference was essential to real monastic discipline, and a man who had commanded armies might chance to work in the field or at the forge alongside of one whose life had been passed in labour from his childhood.

At first the number of the conversi seems to have been much greater than that of the monks. The great church of Cîteaux, rebuilt soon after the death of St. Bernard, had stalls for 144 monks and 351 conversi, besides 33 places for the infirm. But from several causes the numbers of these fell off more quickly than of those.

¹ The monastic life is often called a military service by old writers, and although it very early became modified in practice, the original idea of the ecclesiastical hours seems to have been taken from the Roman military division of the twenty-four hours into four watches of the day and as many of the night. Terce, sext, nones and evensong correspond with the day watches, and the three nocturns of mattins with lauds which are really separate services, once marked the night watches respectively. It is plainly impossible that the same men should have kept up these services at these hours for any length of time; and I suspect it was only done in large communities, where the night offices could be taken by different companies, and so the "continual voice of praise" be kept up. But soon the night offices were joined into one and said together at one or other of the hours. And prime and compline having been added to make up the "seven times a day" when God was to be praised, the original division was forgotten. The Cistercians separated lauds from mattins, which they called vigils, but did not go further. I think if they had known the original arrangement, they would in their first zeal have tried to imitate it.

² Sometimes a clerk would from humility affect ignorance of letters, and be admitted amongst the conversi. And it was quite in accordance with true monastic discipline that the statutes forbade a conversus ever to become a monk. But if he were in orders, it was contrary to the ideas of the time that he should be in a position which prevented him from using his orders; and in such a case the general chapter seems to have dispensed the statute, and caused the man to be admitted a monk.

Both would be affected by the change in religious fashion—for such it must be called—which drew men towards newer systems. But the spread of literary education amongst the upper classes cut off the source from which the better and perhaps even the larger part of the conversi had been drawn, and they seem generally to have become little better than farm labourers. They had had the care of all the secular affairs of the abbeys under the cellarer, who was always a monk; but the growing difficulty of finding fit men amongst them led to the employment of paid secular servants in their places, and many houses altogether ceased to admit conversi. As early as 1267¹ we find mention of abbots who had none. And after the Black Death in 1349, such cases seem to have been common.

The abbot of a Cistercian house was its ruler in all things spiritual and temporal, but he was not a corporation in himself, keeping a separate household, independent of that of the abbey, as the abbots of the great Benedictine abbeys did. The rule of community of goods applied to the abbot as well as to the convent, and the seal and all legal acts stood in the name of both. In theory the abbot shared the life of the monks, and at first he no doubt to a great extent did so, but the duty of entertaining guests was put upon him, and that led the way to his living apart, and as time went on and discipline became less strict, he seems to have done so almost as completely as the Benedictine did. But there was no separation of the abbot's property from that of the convent.²

The rigid Cistercian spirit, though it produced St. Bernard, was not favourable to scholarship. Indeed, though some reading for edification was ordered, literature was directly discouraged.³ But there were some in the order who felt the need of moving with the times, and that if it was to continue to exist, it must have its place in the intellectual movement which was going on around it. And in 1244 another English Stephen—Stephen of Lexington, abbot of Clairvaux—made a new beginning by establishing a college at Paris, where Cistercian monks might benefit by the teaching of the university, then was administered by the king's servants, who looked more to their own and to their master's interests than to those of the monks. After the division the monks used to beg, and as it seems generally to obtain the administration of their share to themselves.—V. Chronica Jocelini de Braklonda, pp. 6 and 60.

regarded as the greatest seat of learning in Europe. This foundation was made without the sanction of the general chapter, which perhaps would hardly have been obtained if asked. And it shows how the bond of the Charter of Charity had become weakened, that Stephen in defiance of one of its provisions¹ obtained the authority of the Pope for what he had done, before he laid the matter before the chapter at all.² After this, Cistercian schools were established in other universities, including one at Oxford³ in 1436. And from the beginning of the fourteenth century it became the rule for all novices of the order to pass a certain time in one or other of these colleges, unless there happened to be a school in the house to which they belonged. But to the end of their time in England the Cistercians remained, by comparison with men of other orders, unlearned monks. On the other hand, they were the pioneers of industry. Their abbeys, founded as most were in waste land, became centres of successful agriculture. They were ironmasters and wool-growers, and they owned and worked mines. And I suspect that if the story of them could be traced back through the centuries as that of some bell-founding firms has been, there are still busy Yorkshire "works" which would be found to be in unbroken continuation from those begun and long carried on by the Cistercian monks.

SECTION III.

OF THE CISTERCIAN LIFE.

IN this chapter I shall try to describe the ordinary life in a Cistercian abbey whilst the order was still in its first strength, taking for authorities the earliest documents as they are printed in the Nomasticon and by Guignard. The first of all is the old Rule of St. Benedict, the exact observance of which was what they who originally went out from Molesme wished to secure for themselves. The Customs and Statutes were but supplementary to the Rule, and though in time they came to be used to soften its rigour, at the beginning they were intended only to explain the right way of following it, and to supply details not laid down in it.

² It is interesting to us Yorkshiremen to note that part of the means of support of the Paris college was obtained by the impropriation of a moiety of the rectory of Rotherham. A bull of Pope Alexander IV., granted in 1256 to one John of Lexington,—probably a relation of Stephen,—sanctions this impropriation.

Englishmen never bore patiently the sending of rents out of the country for foreign use, and there was evidently some difficulty in raising the revenue in this case, for in 1288 Pope Nicholas IV. by another bull authorised the letting of the monks' portion of the benefice to farm at a fixed rent to some Yorkshire Cistercian house. Both bulls are printed by Jubainville, pp. 365–367.

The great body of the monks were, as has been said before, laymen, in the modern sense of the word; that is to say, they were not in holy orders. They had priests amongst them to minister to them in spiritual things, just as the secular clergy did to men living in the world. But it is characteristic of the specially monastic services that they might go on without even the presence of ordained clergy. The ideal of monastic life was the continual praise of God without the interruption and distraction of worldly affairs. The abbot and a small number of officers under him managed the common property and ruled the house; and when the family consisted, as it often did, of some hundreds of persons, the burden can not have been a light one. The number of abbots who sought leave to resign shows how much it was felt. Any monk was bound to undertake an office if the abbot imposed it on him. But this lot fell to comparatively few, and the simple monk or cloisterer, to use the English word of later times, was studiously protected from outside cares, and except when his turn to act as cook¹ came round, he had nothing to disturb his ordinary routine of life. His home was the cloister, from which opened the church and all the other buildings and places to which duty or necessity would call him in his daily life. So long as he was in health, he need never go beyond them, except to take his part in the common labour in the fields or elsewhere. If he were sick, he would be taken to the infirmary, where his needs would be seen to and his infirmity would not interfere with others in the cloister.

The offices to be said in church and the hours of them are laid down in the rule, and though the modern reader may think the yoke a heavy one, and it was certainly felt to be so by the monks themselves in later times, there is reason to believe that St. Benedict imposed less upon his sons than had been borne by some monks before his time.

The day and the night were each divided into twelve hours, but they were not of constant length, such as we whose time is regulated by mechanical clocks are accustomed to understand by the word. The natural day and the natural night ruled the time, so that the hours varied in length from day to day. Those of the night were long in winter and short in summer, and those of the day the opposite, and it was only at the equinoxes that the hour was the same as ours.

pleasures of the table. But in time the art of cookery came to be highly cultivated in monastic kitchens.

The first duty of the monks was to keep up the regular daily round of services—the opus Dei as they called it—and nothing was allowed to stand in the way of it. Sometimes for convenience it was allowed to say an office rather sooner or rather later than the prescribed hour, but it was never to be omitted. At harvest-tide, when all joined in the ingathering of the crops, and at other times, when monks were at work so far from the church as to make the several journeys to and fro inconvenient, they might say the offices in the field where they were. But all who were near were to leave their other work, whatever it was, and hasten to the church at the first sound of the bell. Late-comers might not take their regular places, but must stand apart by themselves, and afterwards were to make satisfaction by penance.

The office of the night was that now known as mattins, but the Cistercians, using in this, as they did in other matters, the language of St. Benedict, called it vigils—vigiliæ. In the winter half of the year, which was reckoned to be from the first of November till Easter, they rose for vigils at the eighth hour of the night, that is, about two o'clock a.m. Except on feasts of twelve lessons and a few other days, the office for the dead followed; and after that, or vigils, as the case might be, such time as remained before dawn was filled up with meditation or reading, lights being placed in the cloister by the book-case, and in the chapter-house, for the convenience of readers.¹ At dawn, on the sign being given him by the abbot, the sacrist rang the bell for the return to the church, and the short office now called lauds, but by the monks mattins, was sung.

In the other half of the year the hour of rising was so arranged that there should always be a short interval between vigils and mattins, which was to be said at daybreak. The service of vigils was somewhat shortened in summer, and the office for the dead was said after evensong, but even then the time of rest was so reduced that to make it up a midday sleep or meridien was allowed.

There were lights in a few places, but for the most part the church was dark during vigils, and the monks sang the psalms from memory. It was the custom for the abbot or the prior occasionally to go round the quires of the monks and of the lay brothers, to see that everyone was awake.

At the first hour of the day, which would be six a.m. in spring and autumn, prime was sung, and then at regular intervals, at or near the hours which correspond with their names, terce, sext and nones.

¹ The chapter-house was used because it was less open to the weather than the cloister, which had not its windows glazed in early times.

About six p.m. evensong followed, and soon after, compline, the office which ended the day.

These offices were the fixed points in the monks' day, other duties and necessary occupations coming in between them, but varying according to the day or season. Except vigils, which, as mentioned before, is really three offices, and evensong, which is longer than the others, they are short, and even when said fully and with the moderate slowness which was ordered, they would not take up so much time as not to leave considerable intervals.

All the monks were present at Mass in quire once on ordinary days and twice on feasts, high Mass being sung after prime on ordinary days and after terce on feasts, when a Mass called the morning Mass was sung after prime. Besides these, monks who were priests might celebrate privately, but there was no rule that they must do so daily.¹

All, unless expressly forbidden by the abbot, were bound to receive holy communion on Christmas-day, Maundy Thursday, Easter-day, and Whitsun-day. And all who could² were to do so every Sunday. Any who chanced not to do so then, might, if he would, on some following day of the week.

All received in both kinds, and the directions for the administration of the cup are minute and curious. The gospeller, having received the Species of bread at the hands of the priest, took the chalice from the altar and communicated himself from it standing, and then, if there were only one or two more to receive, he administered to them, holding the chalice to their lips as they knelt; those of the orders of subdeacon and upwards guiding the chalice by its foot, but others not touching it. If the communicants were many, the silver pipe called the fistula was used. The epistoler fetched it from the credence as soon as he himself had received the Body, and going round by the back of the altar, took it to the north end, where the gospeller placed the chalice after he had received from it himself. Then the epistoler held the chalice firmly with both hands on the corner of the altar, and the gospeller held in it the pipe, through which first the epistoler and then the others received. They first received the Body kneeling from the priest at the south end of the altar, and then passing behind him went to the north end, where they received the Blood standing; and as they left the presbytery the sacrist offered to each a drink of wine for an "ablution." If there were many communicants, the gospeller filled up the chalice as there was need with unconsecrated wine, which it was thought would take consecration from contact with the Sacrament.¹

After terce on ordinary days, or the morning Mass when it was sung, the chapter was held, the abbot, or in his absence some other officer, presiding. The chapter began with the reading of the martyrology for the day, followed by a short office of prayer for the faithful departed, and then a portion of the rule of St. Benedict was read. This was the chapter the reading of which gave the name to the assembly. The names of those monks to whom different duties were assigned were written on a tablet, and were read out each week in chapter when all were present; and if a man knew of any hindrance to his performing what was set down to him, it was his duty to state it then and there, and to ask to be excused. If this were not done, and exemption had to be sought afterwards, it was regarded as a fault, for which pardon must be asked. After the reading of the tablet, a formal commemoration of all deceased members and associates (familiares) of the order was made, and on feast days an instruction or sermon, according to the time, was delivered by the president or by some other appointed by him. This ended, the president said Let us now speak of our order, and commemoration was made by name of those recently dead, and the chanter read any letters which might have been received announcing deaths in other monasteries.

Then followed a specially monastic feature of the chapter—the public confession and punishment of faults. Any monk who knew that he had offended was formally to "seek pardon"² and state what he had done amiss. And if any knew of fault in another, he was to say so plainly in few words.³ The accused might deny the accusation if he felt it to be unjust, and the accuser was not to repeat it unless ordered to do so, but others who knew anything of the matter might speak. A rule which must have been very useful if strictly enforced, forbade a man who had been denounced to denounce his denouncer at the same chapter.

Cases which ordinarily came before the chapter and were dealt with there, were punished by penances such as loss of precedence in

² Petat veniam. Veniam petere is to be understood, not literally, but as meaning to assume an attitude of humility which might vary in depth according to occasion from a simple bow to a prostration on the ground. The phrase so far became conventional that it was used for an ordinary bow of ceremony or politeness, and for kneeling down on hearing the sackering bell.

the convent, fasting on bread and water, and sometimes flogging, which was administered on the spot. Excommunication was used sometimes, and serious crimes were punished by imprisonment, exile, or expulsion from the order.

Whatever passed in chapter was to be kept secret, and was not even to be spoken of in any other place.

When the chapter was ended, all went into the cloister except any who might remain behind for private confession and for ghostly counsel, which might be sought at this time of the prior and of other priests who might remain behind in the chapter-house at a sign from any who wished to confer with them.

On work-days all went to labour after chapter until the bell rang for terce. The prior, if he were at home and well, directed the work, summoning the rest before him as he stood or sat in the parlour, and ordering what was to be done. As far as possible the work was carried on in silence, and all who were not prevented by necessary engagements in the house, went out to take their part in it. It was not allowed to read or even to carry a book in the time of labour. The work was of various kinds, but in the early days of the order was chiefly the clearing and cultivating of the land, and such help as unskilled men could give towards building. When they worked at a considerable distance from the abbey, they remained out until it was time to return for dinner, saying the hours at the proper times where they were. But those who were working near returned to the church for them.

On some feasts they worked as on ordinary days, but on others and on all Sundays, instead of going out to work after chapter, they sat in the cloister and read. For this they probably used the sides of the cloister next the church and towards the west, as was the custom amongst the Benedictines. But so far as I know we have not any certain proof of the distribution of a Cistercian cloister in early times.

At the time of reading the monks were free to enter the church for private prayer, precautions being taken to prevent this being made an excuse for idleness. And those who had offices to serve went about their business.

From Easter to Whitsuntide the monks dined after sext and had supper after nones, and the same for the rest of the summer half of the year, except that on Wednesdays and Fridays they dined after nones and had no supper. For the winter half of the year, from the thirteenth of September until Easter, they had but one meal, after nones—except in Lent, when it was after evensong, which was to be said early enough to allow of the dinner being finished by daylight.

Each monk had a daily allowance of a pound of bread and a measure (emina) of drink, which was always the same, a third of it being reserved for the second meal when there were two. At dinner there were to be two cooked dishes, to which another of fruit or salad might be added in their seasons. No flesh-meat nor fish was to be eaten, and lard was not to be used in the cooking. St. Benedict had allowed to the abbot a discretion as to the food, which, as time went on, was used without scruple, and the rule was made of none effect. But the early Cistercians observed it exactly.

The frater was arranged with a table at the end opposite the door, and others on each side against the walls. At meal times the tables were covered with linen cloths, and the cellarer and cooks who waited on their brethren ought to have had everything necessary on the tables before they came in. About in the middle of the west wall was the pulpit for the reader.

The prior generally presided in the frater, as the abbot had to entertain the guests, but if there were no guests the abbot was to dine with the others.

After the preceding hour had been sung, if the dinner was ready, the prior gave the signal, and all went to the laver and washed their hands, after which they entered the frater. If, however, the dinner was not ready, he waited until it was, the monks meanwhile sitting at their books in the cloister. Each man as he entered the frater bowed towards the high table, and then stood by his seat till the prior came; or, if he were late, which he was specially enjoined not to be, men sat and rose up at his coming. The prior on taking his place rang a little bell for a time,¹ and then the priest for the week blessed the meal, the convent joining in the responses. When they were sat down the reader began, and the prior gave the signal to the rest by uncovering his bread.

The behaviour of the monks at table is carefully ordered in the consuetudines, and the passage is curious from the view it gives us of the customs of polite society in the first half of the twelfth century. No one was to leave the room during the meal, nor to walk about whilst eating. He was not to wash his cup with his fingers, but he might wipe it if he liked. He might not wipe his hands or his knife on the table-cloth unless he first cleaned them on his bread. He was to help himself to salt with his knife, and when he drank he was to hold the cup with both his hands.²

² The holding of the cup in both hands was, I know not why, looked on as a sign of humility. Amongst the pottery which Mr. Walbran found at Fountains were some little cups like tea-cups, with two handles; and Mr. Hope and I have found others at Jervaulx and at Kirkstall. These are no doubt the scyphi of the monks.

At the end of the meal the prior stopped the reader and rang his bell, at the sound of which all rose and went in order, singing the fifty-first Psalm on the way, to the church, and there returned thanks.

The reader and those who had served at table dined after the others, one of them presiding, and the same forms being observed as with the convent. But to all those who, by reason of their service, had to dine thus late, an extra allowance called mixtum was given on all days except the week-days in Lent, the rogation and ember days, and certain vigils. Mixtum was to each man a quarter of a pound of bread and a third of a measure of drink,—perhaps half a pint,—and it was taken in the frater before or after sext, as the day might be. The younger men were also allowed mixtum, which they took before terce.

In summer, to make up for their want of sleep in the short nights, the monks went to the dorter after dinner and slept an hour, and then, at the sound of the church bell, they rose and washed, and entered the church for nones.

After nones, if there was no supper, the monks went together into the frater, where those who would might drink. It appears that a man might take either water or a part of his allowance.

After supper on supper-days, or after evensong at other times, all the monks assembled together in the cloister, and one of them read aloud either from the Bible or from some other book thought to be edifying. This reading was called collation.

Every Saturday, during collation, the feet of all the monks in turn were washed by those who had served as cooks for the week and those who were to do so for the coming week. This was the weekly maundy, and it must not be confounded with the ceremony of Maundy Thursday in commemoration of our Lord's washing of the feet of the Apostles, which was observed in Cistercian abbeys as it was in other places.

After collation all the monks went together to the church and sang compline, which was the last service of the day, and then they went to bed. Absolute silence was to be kept after compline until the following day.

Such was the ordinary life of the monks, varied only by the season of the year and the alternation of feast and work-day. Even the greatest of the church's holy days brought no variation, except in the service said and the sermon in chapter, and the special ceremonies belonging to a few of them such as Ash Wednesday and Palm Sunday. Of these it is unnecessary to say more here than that they were observed in the abbeys as they were in other places, but with the Cistercian simplicity and studied absence of pomp.

When from old age or infirmity the monk could no longer take his part with his brethren, he withdrew from the cloister to the infirmary, where his bodily needs were cared for; and he lived dispensed from the exact observance of the rule, but keeping it, or at least being expected to keep it, in the spirit and so far to the letter as his weakness permitted.

The soul of the dying monk was sped on its way with much solemnity. The abbot himself, or in his absence the priest highest in office, administered the last sacraments in the presence of the whole convent, who were summoned to the church for the purpose, and went thence in procession, singing psalms by the way, to the place where the sick man lay. When the last moment came, the dying man was laid upon the floor, where ashes had been strewn in the form of a cross. This was a practice not peculiar to Cistercians or even to monks. And even as early as the date of the first written Customs, the Cistercians had so far toned down the harshness of it as to direct¹ that a mat or some straw be laid over the ashes and a quilt over all. The tabula or clapper, which was a board hung in the cloister and struck with a mallet, was sounded, and at once, if the monks were at work or in cloister or doing anything which could be left, all hurried to the dying man. If they were in church, some only went, and the others followed when they had finished what they were engaged upon. And so the monk died, with his brethren praying round him.

After death the body was washed in a place reserved for that use, and was wrapped in a winding-sheet, the convent meanwhile saying an appointed service of psalms and prayers in another place not far away, to which the body was brought when made ready, and the abbot sprinkled it with holy water and censed it, and it was taken to the church with procession and singing. If it were before dinner, Mass for the dead was said, and the body buried that day. But if it were after dinner, the burial was put off until the next day, when Mass could be said; and meanwhile a number of monks were always in the church, keeping up a continual service for the dead. After the Mass the body was solemnly taken to the graveyard at the east end of the church, and there buried. For thirty days a special memory of the deceased was kept in church and in chapter, his name was entered in the book and read out in chapter year by year as his death-day came round, and notice of the death was sent by a special messenger bearing a brief to other houses which were bound by a mutual agreement to do for each others' members as for their own.

At every meal a share of the food was set apart in the name of the dead and given to the poor, whose prayers were expected in return.

These memorials after death were very highly valued in the Middle Ages, and it was to obtain a share in them that people living in the world sought to be associated with or, as the phrase then went, to be joined with the family of the abbeys. These were the familiares of whom mention is made in monastic writings. They took no obligations upon themselves on admission. But generally as benefactors they paid in things temporal for the spiritual benefits which they believed themselves to be receiving. A monk might ask for the prayers of his convent on the death of his father, mother, brother, or sister, and they were to be given, but he might not ask them for others. And each year during the general chapter the dead relations of the brethren of the order were absolved by name by the assembled abbots.¹

The conversi or lay brethren lived partly in the abbey and partly in the outlying granges, of which, under the cellarer, they had the charge. Whilst in the abbey, their life was not very different from that of the monks, except that as their want of letters made it impossible for them to take their parts in the services as the monks did, they kept the canonical hours differently, saying at each certain verses and responds, and instead of psalms and lessons, saying Pater Noster and Gloria Patri alternately a number of times, varying from forty at vigils on feasts of twelve lessons, to five at the minor hours daily. These and the Apostles' Creed and the fifty-first Psalm, which was said daily after dinner as by the monks, the lay brethren were to know by heart.² When in church they repeated their prayers privately and in silence, because at the same time the monks were saying their office in their quire. But elsewhere they said them openly.

The brethren rose later than the monks,—in winter not till the monks had partly sung their vigils, and in summer not till they sang mattins (lauds) at dawn. Then having said their own offices up to the end of prime, the brethren went out to work. On Sundays and on non-working feasts they kept the same times as the monks, and on these days they were present at both Masses, unless they held offices which prevented them. Each brother was to receive holy communion seven times in the year on specified feasts, or as near to them as might be. They who lived in granges were expected to come to the abbey for their communion, but for sufficient reason the abbot might allow them to make it elsewhere.

² It may be noted that the Ave Maria, the repetition of which became so large a part of the devotion of the illiterate at the end of the Middle Ages, was not named amongst the things to be taught to a Cistercian lay brother in the twelfth century.

On days when there was a sermon in the monks' chapter-house, the lay brethren went to hear it. And three times a year,—on the morrows of Christmas-day, Easter-day and Whitsun-day,—their own chapter was held, the abbot or one appointed by him presiding, and like forms being used as in the monks' chapter. The admission of lay novices was formally made in their own chapter, after they had been received in that of the monks, and it might be specially assembled for the purpose.

The brothers dined and supped in their own frater at the same time and of the same dishes as the monks in theirs, and observing like forms, except that the brothers could not provide a reader from themselves, and it does not appear that one was supplied to them by the monks. Their prior, one of themselves, presided at table; and after dinner they said grace in the church as the monks did. The allowance for mixtum to a lay brother was half a pound of bread, being twice that given to a monk, but without wine; or, instead of that which was the ordinary table bread of the convent he might, if he wished, have a larger quantity of coarse bread. Of this coarse bread, which was probably such as was commonly eaten by the peasantry of the time, there seems not to have been any stint to the Cistercian lay brother over and above his "commons" which was, as to a monk, the pound of bread directed by St. Benedict. This additional allowance of food was because of the harder work done by the lay brother; and for the same reason, in granges where probably the work was hardest, the fasting-days,—that is, the days upon which there was only one set meal,—were much fewer than in the abbeys themselves.

The lay brothers worked for the benefit and profit of their house in all sorts of useful crafts, but such as ministered to luxury were forbidden. They were to observe silence generally, smiths only being allowed to speak in their workshops. Other trades had "parlours" outside their shops, where necessary talking might be done. If a stranger addressed them on the road they were to give him necessary information, but to tell him civilly that they were not allowed to talk.

In sickness and in death the treatment of a lay brother scarcely differed from that of a monk, and like service was done for him after death.

NOTE.—The three chapters on the Cistercian Order printed here were written for the Yorkshire Archæological Journal a good many years ago, and were intended to appear separately in successive numbers, and to be followed by two more on the Decay of the Rule and on the Cistercian Buildings. It now happens that the three appear together at a time when owing to pressure of other work I am not able to write the other two. But I hope to do so before long. Since these were written there has appeared a new edition of the Nomasticon Cisterciense, in which are printed the early texts first used by Guignard and here quoted from his book. The Nomasticon is the official book, and perhaps less rare in England than the other, and in future reference will be made to it.—J. T. M.

FOUNTAINS ABBEY.

INTRODUCTION.

ALTHOUGH it cannot compare in architectural splendour with Tintern, nor in beauty of situation with Rievaulx, Fountains Abbey, from the great extent and preservation of its buildings, and the ease with which they may be studied, certainly takes the first place in importance among the Cistercian abbeys of England and Wales. The buildings have, moreover, been freed from the encumbrance of rubbish, trees, and ivy; and are maintained by their noble owner in excellent order.

Much has been written from time to time on the history and architecture of Fountains Abbey, the best accounts being by the late Mr. Walbran and Mr. Gordon M. Hills, but no attempt has hitherto been made to shew the true uses of the various buildings by comparison with the existing remains and documentary history of other Cistercian houses.

To Mr. Walbran a double debt of gratitude is due (1) for his successful endeavours to have the ruins of the abbey properly excavated, and (2) for the valuable series of documents bearing on its history, edited by him for the Surtees Society, the first volume of which was issued in 1863,¹ and an incomplete second volume in 1878, after his death. The important excavations carried out by the late Earl de Grey and Ripon were the outcome of a privately-printed tract written and issued by Mr. Walbran in 1846, entitled "Observations on the necessity of clearing out the conventual church of Fountains." The excavations were actually begun in November, 1848, on the site of the monks' infirmary, then known as the abbot's house, and were afterwards extended to the area between it and the cloister, and finally to the church.²

Mr. Gordon M. Hills's paper was published by the British Archaeological Association in 1871 in Collectanea Archaeologia,³ and is the first technical account of the architectural history of the abbey. Mr. Hills was also the first to recognise that the so-called abbot's house was actually the infirmary. His paper is accompanied by an excellent plan from his own measurements and on a fairly large scale, as well as by some admirable drawings, some of which, with permission, have been reproduced in the present paper. Besides his paper on Fountains Abbey, Mr. Hills wrote important contributions on the Cistercian abbeys of Buildwas,¹ Ford,² and Croxden,³ and useful notes concerning Rievaulx,⁴ Bindon,⁵ and Roche⁶ abbeys.

Since the appearance of the various papers by Mr. Hills, much new matter has become available concerning the Cistercian Order through the publication of the Consuetudines and other important documents.⁷ These have been made excellent use of by Mr. J. T. Micklethwaite in his valuable paper on "the Cistercian Plan"⁸ and by the Rev. J. T. Fowler, in his exhaustive edition of the "Cistercian Statutes, A.D. 1256-7," etc.⁹

The following paper has been written after a sojourn amidst the ruins of Fountains Abbey during the whole of September, 1887, and September, 1888, and a comparative examination of the remains of nearly all the Cistercian monasteries in this country. The writer has also collated and compared the extensive documentary matter relating to the abbeys of Fountains, Kirkstall, Meaux, Croxden, Pipewell, Waverley, Newenham, Louth Park, Whalley, Rievaulx, and others. The results of these and other researches have led to a reconsideration of the uses of the various parts of Fountains Abbey, and to conclusions sometimes differing from those of former investigators. These conclusions have been confirmed by a most interesting account of a visit of the Queen of Sicily in 1517 to the abbey of Clairvaux, where the arrangements were similar to those of the daughter house of Fountains. This document was published by M. Didron so long ago as 1845, but seems to have been entirely overlooked by English antiquaries.¹⁰ Finally, the conclusions now set forth were submitted to the members of the Yorkshire Archæological Society at a special excursion to Fountains Abbey in 1888, and accepted by those present who were specially qualified to express an opinion. Such additional matter as has come to light since has been entirely of a confirmatory character.

In the interval that has elapsed between the writing and the printing of this paper, another important contribution has been made to the architectural history of Fountains Abbey by the publication of a monumental series of plans and measured drawings done for the Marquess of Ripon by Mr. J. Arthur Reeve.¹ The drawings are elevations to scale of the whole of the buildings, and they represent not only the architectural features, but each course and stone of the masonry, and any important scar, defect or crack. They are, in fact, accurate pictures of almost every wall in the abbey. The plates are accompanied by an historical introduction and an excellent architectural description. As Mr. Reeve has adopted most of the writer's new ascriptions of the buildings, it is but fair to him as well as the writer to state that the debateable points were fully discussed between them on the spot.

Besides Mr. Reeve's drawings, another set of almost equal importance has been made independently by Mr. Harold Brakspear, but not published. The Society is greatly indebted to Mr. Brakspear for his admirable plan of the abbey, which he has obligingly drawn out and placed at its disposal, and is further indebted to Mr. Reeve for the liberal permission so freely accorded to the writer to make use of his drawings in the accompanying illustrations.

GENERAL HISTORY.

The history of the origin and foundation of Fountains Abbey is fully set forth in an early chronicle dictated by Serlo, one of the first monks, to Hugh, a monk of the daughter house of Kirkstall. This chronicle has been printed by the Surtees Society,² for whom it was edited by the late Mr. Walbran, together with a most valuable series of charters and other illustrative documents. We learn from the chronicle that towards the end of the year 1132, certain monks of the Benedictine abbey of St. Mary at York, being dissatisfied with the laxity of the rule as there observed, determined to leave the monastery and adopt the Cistercian rule. Their proposal met with the greatest opposition on the part of the brethren, and it was not until they obtained the assistance of the archbishop, Thurstan, who took them under his protection and gave them shelter for a time, that they were able to carry out their object. The brethren who thus left St. Mary's Abbey included Richard the prior, Richard the sacrist, and eleven other brethren, but one of the latter afterwards returned to the monastery; their number was, however, again raised to thirteen by the addition of Robert, a monk of Whitby.

After spending Christmas-day at Ripon with Archbishop Thurstan, he assigned to them a dwelling place, "a place remote from all the world, uninhabited, set with thorns, and among the hollows of mountains and prominent rocks on every side, fit more, as it seemed, for the dens of wild beasts than for the uses of mankind. And the name of this spot is Skelldale, a valley of a stream flowing in the same place." Here the monks, under prior Richard as their abbot, took up their abode, and spent the winter in much hardship, their only shelter being a thatched hut round the stem of a great elm that grew in the middle of the valley, and their food bread given to them by the good archbishop. During the day, some occupied themselves in weaving mats, others in cutting twigs in the neighbouring wood whence an oratory might be constructed (unde oratorium construatur), while yet others applied themselves to cultivating little gardens.

The winter over, the brethren, having taken counsel among themselves and decided to adopt the Cistercian rule, sent messengers to St. Bernard, the great abbot of Clairvaux, setting forth in their letter the reason of their departure from St. Mary's Abbey, York, and asking to be admitted into the Order. The messengers returned, bringing letters from St. Bernard, and a monk of Clairvaux, Geoffrey by name, who taught the brethren the new rule into which they were now formally admitted. The number of the brethren was further increased by the addition of seven clerks and ten novices. After this, a great famine visited the district, and the unfortunate brethren were reduced to such straits for food that they cooked herbs and leaves, and so "the elm under which they had so long abode conferred a double benefit upon them, being a shelter in the winter, food in summer."¹

For two years the convent laboured in great poverty, until at last, in despair, the abbot himself went to Clairvaux and asked St. Bernard to find him and his brethren a place there. St. Bernard granted this request and assigned one of the granges of his abbey to them, with the adjoining lands. During, however, Abbot Richard's absence,

Hugh, dean of York, a man of considerable wealth, was moved to resign his office and join the convent of Fountains, bringing with him not only money and portable property, but books of the holy scriptures.

The proposed removal across the seas was now abandoned, and the convent apportioned their newly acquired wealth into three parts: one for the relief of the poor, a second for their buildings, and the rest for the necessities of the monastery. Two other canons of York, named Serlo and Tosti, both men of substance, also followed the example of their dean, and joined the community of Fountains, and added their wealth to the common fund. From that day the abbey increased in wealth and importance, and the convent in numbers, so much so that only five years after its foundation, viz. in 1138, a daughter house, that of Newminster, was founded, and as soon as the necessary temporary buildings were ready for their reception in the following year, was colonized by a convent of monks from Fountains.

Although the history of the foundation, and the trials and hardships of the first monks are so fully set forth in the chronicle, nothing whatever is said therein about the building of the church and monastery. Other and later documents, however, fortunately exist, which, aided by what the buildings themselves tell, enable us to trace with tolerable certainty the growth of the church and the monastic buildings.

According to the Cistercian rule, every new abbey was to commence with an abbot and twelve other monks, for whose abode certain buildings were to be previously set up, viz. a church or oratory, a frater, dorter, a guesthouse, and a porter's lodge.¹ The circumstances of the founding of Fountains Abbey did not, of course, in its case allow this to be done, but the chronicle shews that it was carried out as regards the daughter houses. Thus in the case of Newminster we are told that the founder, in 1138, "edificiis inibi, de more, dispositis, abbatiam construit";² at Louth Park in 1139, "missis fratribus in locis designatis edificia construit, erigit officinas";³ and at Woburn in 1145, "ædificiis de more constructis."⁴ These first buildings were usually

"Quomodo novella ecclesia Abbate et monachis et ceteris necessariis ordinetur. Duodecim monachi cum abbate tercio decimo ad cœnobîa nova transmittantur: nec tamen illuc destinetur donec locus libris, domibus et necessariis aptetur, libris dumtaxat missali, Regula, libro Usuum, psalterio, hymnario, collectaneo, lectionario, antiphonario, gradali, domibusque of a temporary character only, probably of wood, or even wattle and daub. Occasionally we get a more or less detailed account of them. Thus, at Meaux, the founder caused to be built for his new convent "quandam magnam domum, licet ex vili cenate, . . . in qua conventus adventurus, donec providentius pro eis ordinaretur, habitaret. Fecit etiam quandam capellam juxta domum prædictam . . . ubi monachi omnes in inferiori solario postea decubabant, et in superiori divina officia devotius persolvebant."¹ And we are further told that shortly afterwards, on account of the increase in their numbers, "capella de qua superius fiebat mentio, quæ tunc oratorium et dormitorium monachorum exstiterat, nimis arcta erat, ubi tot monachi et psallerent et pausarent. Abbas ipse Adam et monachi ædificaverunt magnam illam domum ubi nunc brasium nostrum conficitur de tabulis quæ de ipso castro ligneo exstiterunt²; cujus partem superiorem similiter pro oratorio, inferiorem vero pro dormitorio diutius habuerunt."³

Though, as has been said, there is no account of the early buildings at Fountains, we know that the monks were at first housed in temporary structures of some sort, since one of their first acts on the coming of Geoffrey of Clairvaux was to build huts (casas erigunt). When the present buildings were begun is uncertain; hardly, one would think, during the monks' first two years of distress and poverty, but more probably when the Dean of York brought them his wealth, in 1135. Of one thing, however, there can be no doubt, that the plan was laid out on the peculiar Cistercian lines under the direction of Geoffrey de Clairvaux. The greater part of the church was also probably built under his supervision, as there are certain un-English features about the existing nave and transepts which are not found elsewhere, and appear to be due to foreign influence.

Although subsequent alterations have done much to obliterate the first buildings, considerable remains of them exist; and it is interesting to find not only that they were originally laid out on a large scale, but that the plan of the present buildings is in the main that first set out.

Of the original buildings the transepts and nave of the church are yet standing, and the plan and extent of the presbytery can be traced. A good deal of the eastern range also remains, as well as some of the walls of the appendages east of it. The buildings on the south of the cloister have nearly all been reconstructed, but a fragment in the south-west corner of the cloister, and the eastern wall of the western range are of the earliest work, and prove that the cloister was from the beginning of the same size as now.

Owing to the amount of later alterations, it is not easy to trace the precise order in which the original church and monastic offices were built; but there seems no reason to doubt that the usual practice was followed. That is to say, the church would be the first work; then the cloister, probably only of wood; then the whole of the eastern range, with the monks' dorter, etc.; next the great western building, having the lay brothers' frater and other offices below, and their dorter above; followed by the warming-house, frater, and kitchen, forming the south range.

At Meaux the south range was built before the western range; the stone arcade of the cloister was the next work, followed by a new great garderobe for the monks, and the monastic infirmary.

The gatehouse, guest-houses, and other buildings in the outer court, were generally among the earliest works, though not always built of stone.

How long the first buildings at Fountains were in course of construction is uncertain. As will be seen presently, there is evidence that most of them were built by 1147, which gives a possible period of twelve years since they were seriously begun.

It may be interesting here to note the account of the building of the daughter abbey of Kirkstall. The monks occupied the site in 1152, having removed from Barnoldswick, where they had been first established in 1147. Henry de Lacy, the founder, himself laid the foundations of the church, and built the whole of it at his own cost; and it was dedicated in 1159. In the days of the first abbot, who died in 1182, "erecta sunt edificia de Kirkestall ex lapide et lignis delatis.¹ Ecclesia videlicet et utrumque dormitorium monachorum scilicet et conversorum, utrumque etiam refectorium, claustrum, et capitulum et aliæ officinæ infra abbatiam necessariæ, et hæc omnia tegulis optime cooperta. Officinas grangiarum ipse disposuit et omnia foris et intus sapienter ordinavit."²

In 1147, in consequence of the prominent part taken by the abbot of Fountains in the deposition of William, archbishop of York, we are told by the chronicler that the friends of the latter "veniunt Fontes in manu armata, et, effractis foribus, ingrediuntur sanctuarium cum superbia, irruunt per officinas, diripiunt spolia, et non

The extent of the damage caused by the fire is now very difficult to estimate. No great harm seems to have been done to the church, so far as may be judged from the existing remains; but the buildings round the cloister were so ruined that they had subsequently either to be reconstructed or rebuilt. The abbot and convent do not seem to have been greatly disheartened by the fire; as the chronicler says: "abbas autem et fratres confortati in Domino, quasi post naufragium, resumptis viribus, navigationem instaurant; lapsa reparant, ruinosa reformant, et sicut scriptum est 'Lateres ceciderunt, sed quadris lapidibus re-edificatur.' Adjuvabant eos ad vicinia viri fideles; et consurgit fabrica longe festivior quam ante fuit."²

The portions of the abbey first rebuilt after the fire were those which were most needed, viz. the eastern range, with the chapter-house, and the monks' dorter over, and the northern half of the western range for the accommodation of the conversi. The eastern of the two guest-houses in the outer court also appears to have been built just after the fire, and was closely followed by the western guest-house. The new works were certainly well advanced before 1170, for abbot Richard died in that year, and was buried in the chapter-house (in capitulo). Of the next abbot, Robert, who ruled over the abbey until his death in 1179, it is recorded: "instauravit ecclesiæ fabricam, edificia construxit sumptuosa." What reparation of the church is here referred to is doubtful; it is possible that some works on the now-destroyed presbytery may be meant.

Memorials of Fountains, i. 102.

It is doubtful who is the abbot here referred to as the builder. Henry Murdac, the abbot at the time of the fire, was consecrated archbishop of York on December 7th, 1147. Notwithstanding that the chronicle gives as his immediate successors Maurice, a monk of Rievaulx, who ruled hardly three months, and Thorald, also a Rievaulx monk, who resigned after two years, neither of them is included in the list of abbots; and the epitaph of John of Kent calls him the tenth abbot, whereas were Maurice and Thorald reckoned as abbots he would rank as twelfth. It thus appears that Henry Murdac held the abbacy with his archbishopric, and so the former did not become vacant until his death in 1153, when he was succeeded at Fountains by Richard, prior of Clairvaux.

The "sumptuous buildings" of abbot Robert are probably the frater and adjoining buildings on the south side of the cloister, and the southern half of the great western range.

Under the successive rules of abbots William (1179-90) and Ralph Haget (1190-1203), there is no record of any building.

The next three abbots all bore the name of John, and each is recorded to have made important alterations in and additions to the monastery.

The first of the three, known as John of York, was abbot from 1203 to 1211, and during his rule the number of the monks so increased that there were not enough altars for them to celebrate at, and the quire was not large enough to contain them, "facta est congregatio monachorum numerosior quam solebat, nam et altaria pauciora ad celebrandum, et chorus humilior et obscurior, et minus capax tantæ multitudinis." The abbot therefore set to work to remedy the inconvenience by enlarging the church eastwards, or as the chronicler puts it: "Aggressus est pro magnitudine animi ejus magnum inchoare, novam scilicet fabricam ecclesiæ Fontanensis, opus inusitatum et admirandum, feliciter inchoatum, sed felicius consummatum." Many men, we are told, wondered at the daring and courage of the man, because he presumed at such a time to commence so unwonted and so sumptuous a work. He, however, trusting in God's help, and placing his hope in the Lord, "fundamentum fabricæ posuit, columnas quasdam erexit." His death happening in the midst of the work, it was carried on by his successor, John the second, abbot from 1211 to 1219, and finally completed by John of Kent, who ruled over the abbey from 1220 to 1247; or, to quote the final words of the chronicler: "Et factum est inusitatum quiddam in hac parte quod tres sibi Johannes successive Fontanensi ecclesiæ præfuerunt, quorum unus fabricam inchoavit, secundus inchoatam viriliter provexit, tercius provectam gloriose consummavit."¹ Leland, in his Collectanea,² gives a much fuller account of the works done by John of Kent: "Successit in abbatia Fontium Joannes de Cantia, qui novam basilicam consummavit, et altaria novem instituit. Addidit et novo operi pictum pavementum. Claustrum novum construxit, et infirmitorium. Porro xenodochium pauperum, sicut hactenus cernitur, venustissime fabricavit in introitu primæ areæ versus austrum." He also notes: "Novem altaria in transversa insula orientalissimæ partis ecclesiæ, ubi multæ columnæ ex nigro marmore albis maculis et magnis intersperso. Erant et in capitulo Fontium et in refectorio magnæ columnæ ejusdem marmoris." A third but similar account of John of Kent's work is also given in the list of abbots in the "President-Book"¹ of Fountains: "Hic novem altaria, Clastrum, Infirmitorium, Pavimentum, ac Xenodochium, tam ad Christi pauperum quam mundi principum susceptionem, fabricavit et consummavit."²

There is, fortunately, no difficulty in pointing out the work done by the three abbots bearing the name of John. The first began, and the second carried on, the beautiful thirteenth century presbytery, which, with its remarkable eastern transept, was completed by John of Kent. Whether the eastern transept, or nine altars, as it was called, is entirely John of Kent's work, will be discussed later. To the new work the third John also added a pictum pavimentum, remains of which still exist in various parts of the building. That John of Kent reconstructed the cloister may be proved by the fragments of it now in the abbey museum, as well as by the doorway and recasing of the western side; while the remains of his magnificent infirmary buildings, built on a platform raised upon four long tunnels over the river Skell, speak for themselves. The eastern half of the great gallery, or approach to the infirmary hall from the cloister, as well as the branch from it to the nine altars, are also his work. There is some doubt as to the xenodochium or guest-house, which John of Kent built for poor folk as well as rich, "in the entry of the first court towards the south." The existing remains on the south side of the court are of earlier date than his time, but have been altered and made more comfortable in a manner suggestive of the date of his rule; it is possible, therefore, that his alterations are comprised in the words "fabricavit et consummavit," and "venustissime fabricavit," especially as no traces of any other buildings of so important a character have been found.

After the death of John of Kent, a considerable interval elapsed without any addition or alteration to the buildings, and the records of the abbey give us no further information respecting them. During the fourteenth century the infirmary chapel and kitchen were built, and the aisles of the great infirmary hall begun to be cut up into chambers; the western half of the gallery from the cloister to the great hall was also built, and the abbot's camera begun.

Towards the close of the fifteenth century, large windows were inserted in the middle of the nine altars and in the west wall of the nave, and some alterations were made in the upper works of the presbytery and nine altars, during the abbacy of John Darnton (1479-1494), who also carried out several minor alterations. It is not unlikely that Darnton also added a story to the central tower, as was done at Kirkstall and Furness, but without due regard to the piers being strong enough to carry the extra weight. Marmaduke Hubby, the next abbot (1494-1526), made considerable alterations in the infirmary and other buildings, which will be fully described in their place. In the church, after an ineffective effort to prop up the central tower, he appears to have taken it down, or intended doing so, and built in its stead, at the end of the north transept, the stately steeple which is so prominent a part of the ruins. He also inserted the large windows in the north and south gables of the nine altars.

In 1539 the abbey was suppressed, and its inmates scattered abroad, and in the next year it was sold, with most of its estates, to Sir Richard Gresham. His representatives sold the site of the abbey in 1597 to Sir Stephen Procter, who pulled down some of the out-buildings to obtain materials for Fountains Hall, a charming house still standing a short distance west of the abbey gatehouse. The main buildings of the abbey appear to have been merely gutted and unroofed and left to go to ruin, and thus have descended to us in a far more perfect state than most religious houses. A great deal of destruction was done in the last century by the then owner, Mr. Aislabie, who amongst other things, rudely levelled the church from end to end, and destroyed the remains of John of Kent's cloister to make a garden in the court. In 1790 and the following year, Mrs. Allanson, Mr. Aislabie's eldest daughter and co-heiress, caused the chapter-house to be cleared of rubbish. Mrs. Lawrence, the next owner, between 1808 and 1845 effected many necessary and extensive repairs, including that of the tower, of the nave aisles, and the groining of the great western range. Between 1848 and 1856 the whole of the abbey buildings were gradually cleared of rubbish and fallen material, and brought to their present excellent condition by the late Earl de Grey and Ripon, to whom all antiquaries owe a deep debt of gratitude. Finally in the September of 1887 and of 1888, the excavations of such parts of the abbey as had been left untouched in the clearing of 1848-56 were carried out by the writer, with the courteous permission of the present noble owner, the Marquess of Ripon, K.G., who not only allowed him a free hand in the matter, but further sanctioned the removal of the huge growth of ivy from the church and other parts, where it was doing serious and insidious damage, and obscuring important architectural features.

Before proceeding to examine in order the different parts of the monastery, it will be convenient to say a few words about the site.

At the lower part of Skelldale, just before the river gets clear of the valley and runs into the alluvial plain to join the Ure at Ripon, three miles below, the rocky sides of the narrow dale open out somewhat, leaving a fairly level plot of ground, the whole of which was eventually occupied by the buildings, courts, and gardens, etc. of the monastery. To what extent the configuration of the valley has altered since the advent thither of the first monks it is difficult to say. The stream now runs close under the steep bank here bounding the south side of the valley, but possibly it has been partly deflected into its present channel by the monks to gain more space for their buildings. On the north side, the rocky cliffs have been largely quarried to build the abbey, and in the last century other alterations in this direction were made by Mr. Aislabie when he constructed the present carriage road. The valley is, however, so deep and secluded, that before the building of the great tower, no sign of the monastery was visible when approached from the north, west or south, until the traveller was within a stone's throw of it. In fact the site is a thoroughly Cistercian one, and conformable to the rule of the Order that "In civitatibus, castellis, villis, nulla nostra construenda sunt cœnobia, sed in locis a conversatione hominum semotis."¹

THE CHURCH.

The church (oratorium) of a Cistercian house was always cruciform in plan.² One of the earliest type would have a short eastern arm; north and south transepts, each with two or three distinct eastern chapels; and a long nave and aisles. Over the crossing was a low tower or lantern. Such a church was divided up as follows: the eastern arm formed the presbytery; the crossing and the east part of the nave contained the monks' quire; then came the retroquire; and the rest of the nave formed the quire of the conversi. The aisles were shut off from the nave by solid stone walls, and used at first merely as passages, but in later days they were often partly cut up into chapels. The transepts seem to have had no special use except as lobbies to the chapels east of them.

The church at Fountains, as planned by the first monks under the guidance of Geoffrey of Clairvaux, circa 1135, consisted of an aisleless presbytery of three bays; north and south transepts, each with three eastern chapels; and a nave and aisles of eleven bays with a western porch. The chapels east of the transept had this peculiarity, that the two flanking the presbytery on either side were

² Except perhaps in the case of some small abbeys for nuns.

11½ feet longer than the others. As the first presbytery and these two flanking chapels were destroyed when the church was enlarged in the thirteenth century, we have no actual evidence of the cause of this unusual arrangement; the question will, however, be referred to later.

From the character of the plinths that remain round most of the building, there can be little doubt that the Norman church was laid out from the first on the large scale just described. It is also evident from the jointing and other features of the masonry that it was not built all at once, but in sections; and this would be a natural course of things in the early days and extreme poverty of the house. The presbytery, the north transept (in part), the south transept, and the south aisle wall¹ up to the window sills, were certainly the earliest works, and were followed by the lower half of the west front and the upper part of the south aisle. From a curious disposition of the lower parts of the buttresses between them, it is probable that the first five bays of the south arcade and clerestory were built next, to be followed soon after by five bays and a half of the north wall. These resemble the southern bays in having an ashlar backing next the aisle between the arches, but the buttresses are built in the normal way. A corresponding length of the north aisle wall² was carried up at the same time to within three courses of the stringcourse under the windows. The western responds³ and upper part of the west end were also now built. The eastern arch of the crossing had no doubt been turned when the presbytery and transepts were built. The stage now reached would naturally enable the northern, southern, and western arches to be also turned, and the low central steeple above them to be carried up. The transepts and eastern part of the nave could thus be roofed in and used for service instead of the temporary church. The arcades were then continued up to the west front,⁴ the aisle vaults turned, and the clerestories finished, together with the remaining length and all the upper part of the north aisle; the western porch was also added. Finally the whole church was roofed in. The vaults of the presbytery and transept-chapels had no doubt been built some time before.

³ There is a break of joint between these responds and the west wall, and the western half of the arches springing from them has, towards each aisle, a similar ashlar backing to that in the easternmost bays.

There is nothing to show whether or not the church was still unfinished at the time of the fire. So far as the architectural evidence goes, it seems to have been completed, but opinions vary on this point.

In some places, notably in the lower parts of the transepts and aisle walls, a roughness of the masonry suggests a much earlier date than that of the work adjoining. But the same rough construction is to be found in work certainly subsequent to the fire, as, for example, under the staircase in the north end of the cellarium. Here its explanation is clearly seen, namely, to afford a key for the plaster wherewith the lower parts of the walls in the church and elsewhere were covered. The ashlar work was merely lime-washed, and then the whole wall surface was "masoned" with broad red or white lines. To this protective coat is no doubt due the absence of all traces of the fire through the reddening and scorching of the stonework.

Since the only evidence of the extent of the original presbytery and its flanking chapels is their foundations underground,¹ the oldest existing parts of the church are the transepts.

The south transept, which is probably the older, from its being the nearer to the claustral buildings, is three bays long. Its west side is divided into three stages in height. The first stage has to the north a round-headed arch opening into the south aisle of the nave, but is otherwise plain; the second stage has two large windows looking over the cloister; and the third stage contains three clerestory windows. All the work is most severe and plain in character, the only relief being given by stringcourses, of which there are five, viz. one beneath each of the two ranges of windows, a third below the wall-plate of the ceiling, and the other two are placed at the springing line of the window-heads, round which they are carried as hood-molds. Against the lower part of the west wall stood the night-stairs to the dorter. The south wall of the transept (Fig. 1) has in the middle a broad square turret, containing a large circular stair or vice running up to the roof. This stair is lighted by four small loops looking into the transept, and by two external loops, one of which was subsequently rendered useless on account of the abutment of the later dorter against the transept gable. West of the stair-turret are the remains of a tall round-headed arch, through which originally ascended a straight flight of steps forming the night-stairs to the dorter, with a landing off them into the turret itself. During the alterations after the fire of 1147, when the dorter was rebuilt, a taller archway with segmental rear-arch was made a little further west, and a half-arch turned over the old doorway to form a separate entry to the turret-stair. This change was necessitated by the raising of the new dorter floor, and the consequent increase in the number of steps thereto, which could not be conveniently carried through the old arch from the transept; advantage was also taken of the alteration to place the stairs against the wall instead of leaving them, as heretofore, some feet from it, where they were more or less in the way.¹ On the east side of the stair-turret is a small segmental-headed door opening into the old vestry, above which is a semi-circular line telling of some contemplated change in the original work.² The middle stage of the south wall of the transept is blank, being masked externally by the monks' dorter, but the uppermost stage has two large and lofty round-headed windows, each with a circular opening, now blocked, over it. The gable itself was lowered in later times to fit a new roof of lower pitch than the old.

Fig. 1.—Internal elevation of the south end of the south transept, shewing the alterations to the dorter door and also the refacing and buttressing of the south-east tower pier.

The east side of the transept has three plain pointed arches, each of two orders, the outer chamfered, the inner square, which originally opened into as many chapels (Fig. 2). Above the arches the wall is blank, but the top story contains three clerestory windows. Both the east and west sides of this transept are complete to the wall-plate. The northern of the three eastern arches, after the removal of the original chapel, formed the entrance from the transept into the south aisle of the new presbytery, but owing to the pressure of the central tower or lantern, another arch of five bold moulded orders, and acutely pointed, was inserted within it by Abbot Huby. The hood-molds of this terminate on the transept side in angels holding large shields, the northern with Huby's initials and his mitre and crosier, the southern charged with three horse-shoes. Above the old arch, a great crack extending right up to the clerestory window has been filled up with new masonry, probably by Abbot Darnton. The pier between this and the next arch has been cut away in late times for some way up for the insertion of a tabernacle for an image, perhaps, as at Rievaulx, that of St. Christopher. There are holes above for the fastenings of the canopy to it. (See Fig. 2.)

The middle chapel on this side was lengthened during the fifteenth century, and more light given by a large window of three cinquefoiled lights. This alteration was made by cutting through the old east wall, and inserting a plain pointed arch under it, above which is still the original round window opening (Fig. 2). The old roof, a pointed barrel vault without ribs, was retained. The piscina was walled up, and a four-centred door to the presbytery aisle made opposite it. These alterations were probably the work of Abbot Darnton. The arch from the transept bears marks of a screen or partition as high as the springing of the vault, and sundry pin-holes in the side walls tell of panelling or wooden fixtures of some sort. It seems likely that the reason of the alterations was to turn this chapel into a vestry, a purpose for which it is excellently fitted by size and position.¹ To the south of the new east window, a narrow square-headed door, with a two-light square-headed window over it, was afterwards cut through the elongation of the south wall by Abbot Huby, as a means of communication with a chamber built by him outside the south aisle.

The southernmost chapel is still much in its original state.² It is lighted on the east by two round-headed windows with a large round opening above. The south wall has a drain with side recesses and an upper niche for the cruets, but sadly ruined. Across the middle of the floor is a stone step with a rebate for tiles, and another such remains under the arch from the transept, which was filled by a screen. Part of the altar platform is left, and three feet from the east wall are, on each side, the marks of a reredos or beam. The original pointed barrel vault has been re-set. The division walls between the chapels are solid throughout, as they are at Kirkstall, Buildwas, and other early churches. In later buildings, as at Roche, Netley, Tintern, etc. a perpend wall formed the division.

The south transept was usually the place for the clock. Thus at Rievaulx, among the furniture of "the south crosseile," were "an old oreloge of tymbre, steple fashion," and a "clokehouse and a clok therin complete."³ The corbels for it remain at Furness.

The north transept resembled the south in every way, so far as the east and west sides are concerned; but the north wall was entirely removed when the new tower was built outside it, and we can only guess what it was like.⁴ The altered pitch of the roof is plainly visible on the tower.

The southern of the three eastern arches of this transept has been destroyed, leaving only its north jamb, which has grooves and other marks of a screen. There is nothing to shew whether a later arch was inserted in it by Abbot Huby, as on the south side. The middle arch opens into a chapel, which has lost most of its vault and east windows. The large round-headed drain in the south wall is nearly

³ Chartulary of Rievaulx (Surtees Society, 83), 336. At Meaux a Horologium quo horæ diei per campanam signantur was among the Ornamenta ecclesiæ in 1396, but its place is not stated. Chronica de Melsa, iii. lxxvii.

perfect. The base of the altar is left, with the marks of its reredos, and some small tile paving of the time of Abbot John of Kent. In Abbot Huby's days the arch from the transept was blocked by a strong wall, and the entrance to the chapel narrowed to a small four-centred doorway. Over this, in the transept, is a bracket for an image, and below, in raised black letter:

Altare sci michaelis arch'

The northern chapel is completely shut off from the transept by a solid stone wall, also the work of Abbot Huby, who made a new entrance into it from the adjoining chapel, thereby destroying the old drain. The chapel itself is quite perfect, but after it was walled off from the transept it seems to have been disused as a chapel and turned into a sacristy or store-place.¹ Its altar was removed and set up in the transept against the partition wall, where its base still remains. High up are the remains of a black-letter inscription in raised letters, which Mr. Walbran and others have read as referring to St. Peter. As a matter of fact the portion left plainly reads:

Altare pro

and the other letters, which are unfortunately quite illegible, took up an equal amount of space. Possibly when complete the inscription read:

Altare prophetar[um], but that is a somewhat unlikely dedication.

Against the pier separating the southern and middle chapel are the remains of another but smaller altar, with the holes for a reredos or table above.

The old central tower or lantern has utterly perished, and only its north-west and south-east piers remain. The arches appear to have been pointed, and the eastern one to have had more members than the others. In the case of the other three arches, the outermost order towards the lantern was carried by small shafts with scalloped capitals, one in each angle of the tower. That in the south-east corner is perfect, and the north-west one remains in part. In the absence of the tower itself it is impossible to speak with certainty of its height or fashion, but several large stones of window-jambs lying on the ground seem to show that the original low lantern was raised at least a stage during the fifteenth century, probably by Abbot Darnton. The result was that the whole structure, of which the older part had already been weakened by the removal of its solid eastern supports at the building of the new presbytery, gave way under the increased weight, and sank bodily, tearing asunder its junctions with the south transept, where the filling in of the rent is still visible. (See Fig. 2.) Abbot Darnton appears to have been content with underpinning and partly refacing one side of the crazy south-east pier, and erecting a great buttress of four stages, surmounted by a lion and two other beasts, against its west side.¹ (See Figs. 1 and 2.) His successor, Abbot Huby, was apparently not satisfied with this, for he partly walled up the arch from the transept into the presbytery aisle. Then, leaving the old tower, which probably continued to the last,² he began to build the present magnificent substitute at the end of the north transept.

NOTE.—The ivy has since been destroyed.

The nave, with its north and south aisles, is eleven bays long. The pillars of the arcades are massive cylinders with scalloped octagonal capitals and square bases, the latter being 30 inches high, plain above, with a chamfered plinth below. The pillars support pointed arches of two chamfered orders, with an intermediate roll, and a hood-mold over. (Figs. 3 and 4.) As is usually the case in the earlier Cistercian churches, there is no triforium¹ or wall-passage. The clerestory consists of round-headed windows resting on a bold roll string-course, with another string-course at the springing line continued round all the windows as a hood-mold.

² Unless the old tower continued to the end, it is difficult to account for the complete destruction of the presbytery arcades, which were most likely crushed by the steeple falling upon them.

Fig. 4.—The north aisle of the nave, looking west, shewing the details of the nave pillars, and the manner of vaulting the aisle.

The west wall is divided into two stages a little above the line of the tops of the pillars by a bold corbel table. Below this are three deep round-headed recesses. The middle one is higher and wider than the others, and forms the rear-arch of the great west door. The two side recesses are raised two steps above the floor, and have the remains of a stone bench at the back of each. Above the corbel table the west wall had two tiers of windows, the lower consisting of three round-headed lights, the upper of a great circular opening. The whole was enclosed by a lofty rear-arch or arcade, with a wall-passage behind. In 1494², Abbot Darnton lowered the nave roof and gable, and inserted, in place of the old lights, a large window of seven lights with two transoms and supermonials, but the tracery is now all lost. The arcade in front was then taken down.

The nave aisles were lighted by round-headed windows, high up, one in each bay, and were vaulted throughout with stone. The arrangement of the vaults is peculiar. Each bay is divided from the next by a round arch springing from a scoloped corbel built into the great pillar of the arcade about four feet below its top, and flanked by two large three-quarter-round shafts carrying the inner order of the main arcade on the aisle side. The other end of the arch rests on a scoloped corbel in the aisle wall. The arches are perfectly plain, and square in section. Upon them, and covering each bay, rested a pointed barrel vault without ribs, set transversely across the aisle.³ These vaults have now all fallen, but the cross-arches remain throughout (Fig. 4).

The south aisle has in the first bay a plain round-headed door from the cloister, with a three-light fifteenth-century window over. The second bay retains its Norman window, the narrow space outside not allowing of its enlargement. The next five bays have had fifteenth-century windows inserted in place of the original ones. In the eighth pointed barrel vaults in the chapels east of the transepts, is a Cistercian importation from Burgundy. The system of covering aisles with transverse barrel vaults was usually associated with barrel vaulting over the nave itself, to which the aisle vaults served as an abutment. In this country the nave was never intended to be vaulted, and the foreign system of the aisle vaulting is carried out with Norman details. I have to thank Mr. John Bilson for calling my attention to these features.

³ This method of vaulting, like the

bay the old window remains, but is blocked by the wall of the cellarer's building which abuts against it outside. The ninth bay contains an inserted doorway with segmental rear-arch. This opens on to a wide flight of steps leading from the church up to the dormer of the conversi. Immediately to the east of this door is a straight joint in the masonry extending fourteen courses upwards, and also marking the insertion of an earlier doorway here, as at Beaulieu. This bay has no window, owing to the abutment against it of the great range called the cellarium. The tenth bay contains a large round-headed door with rear-arch and hood-mold, of the period before the fire, which opens into the cellarium; its use will be noticed in its place. Above it is a plain Norman window. The last bay has a large round-headed door from the outside, inserted after the fire. It is now blocked, having been filled up with solid masonry before the suppression of the abbey. The south aisle has no west door, but in the south end of its west wall is a square-headed doorway, 2 feet 8 inches from the floor, to a circular vice in the angle.

The north aisle is similar to that on the south, but has no openings in the ground story, except a round-headed west door, blocked up by masonry before the Suppression, and a wide segmental arch in the sixth bay, which served as an entrance for carts and trucks during the building of the nave, after which it was neatly walled up. The windows on this side remained in their original state to the last, except in the first and third bays, where three-light fifteenth-century windows were inserted. The east end of this aisle had a stone screen or wall up to the springing of the arch, shutting it off from the transept.

Before entering on the question of the very interesting arrangements and divisions of the nave and its aisles, it will be convenient to complete the architectural description of the later portions of the church.

The new presbytery begun by Abbot John of York and continued by his successor, also an Abbot John, was five bays long, with aisles of the same length. It has, however, been utterly ruined, only the outer walls of the aisles being left, but these are fortunately perfect. Of the arcades, the south-west respond,¹ the plinth of the first south pier, and part of that of the fourth north pier, alone remain. The respond is a half-octagon in plan; but if we may rely upon what is almost certainly a large piece of one of the piers,² their section was of the form shewn below the stringcourse was afterwards rebuilt by Abbot John Darnton, who also underpinned the pier and added the moulded plinth (Fig. 1). Had the opposite pier remained until our time, it would perhaps have shown a similar treatment.

in Fig. 5, the keeled shafts being of Nidderdale marble. The stone shafts were not banded, and ran through from base to capital; but the marble shafts had marble collars midway. The aisles have against the wall a continuous stone bench, on which stands an arcade of twenty-two trefoiled arches on each side, supported originally by detached marble shafts. With the sole exception of the westernmost on the north side, these shafts have all gone. Each bay has a tall lancet-window, with a curious hook-shaped arch on each side, originally carried by marble shafts. The window jambs also had marble shafts (Fig. 6). The westernmost bay on each side has a blind arch instead of a window, owing to the transept chapel behind. In the south aisle the twentieth and twenty-first arches of the wall arcade have been cut away for the insertion of a fifteenth-century door into the vestry,¹ but the voussoirs of the arches have been re-used to continue the arcade over it. On the bench under the seventeenth arch on this side has been cut a water-drain.² The aisles had pointed vaults with moulded ribs, springing on the wall side from triple groups of marble shafts resting on corbels above the arcade. In the fourth bay of each aisle, in the fourteenth arch of the wall-arcade, is a prominent vertical break in the otherwise regular fine jointing of the masonry. A reference to the ground plan will show that this break exactly coincides with the line of the east walls of the chapels that flanked the first presbytery, and proves that the eastern part of the new presbytery was completed as far as the old presbytery before the latter was pulled down.

The eastern responds of the presbytery and the beautiful eastern transept called, probably from the first, the nine altars, are the work of Abbot John of Kent, or his immediate predecessor, who is said to have carried on John of York's work. The responds have a section similar to Abbot John of York's piers, but the main shafts were filleted, and the subordinate shafts circular instead of keeled.

Between the presbytery and the nine altars was a lofty arch, carried on each side by three tall marble shafts, the bases of which stood on top of a stone screen or gallery across the church at this point. The presbytery was originally covered by a stone vault, supported by flying buttresses across the aisles.

² This either served an old altar retained after the enlargement of the presbytery, or a lavatory in connection with the vestry. It may also have served for pouring away what was left of the holy water at the end of the Sunday procession.

The part of the church known as the nine altars forms an eastern transept like those at Canterbury, Rochester, Beverley, and Lincoln, but differs from them in having no building projecting eastwards, a peculiarity it shares with its only parallel, the nine altars at Durham, which it probably suggested. It is 117 feet in length, and is divided into three principal sections by two arcades, each of two arches, in continuation of those of the presbytery. The middle section is thus much narrower than the others. The dividing piers of the arcades consist of tall slender octagonal pillars about 50 feet high, set diagonally, and originally surrounded by clusters of four large and four small detached marble shafts, banded midway. These shafts have, unfortunately, been removed. The arches are not the original ones, but date from a re-construction of the upper works by Abbot Darnton at the end of the fifteenth century, when the stone vaults of the nine altars and the presbytery, and the dividing arch between them, were taken down, and a new open roof carried through from the west end of the presbytery to the middle gable of the nine altars.

The ground story of the nine altars has a wall arcade like that in the presbytery, also standing on a stone bench (Fig. 7). At each end of the west wall is a small doorway into a stair-turret at the corner, and both the end walls have, at their western ends, wide doorways under flat segmental rear-arches, carried by nook shafts. On the west side, the wall arcade is continuous, the turret doors being made in it, and the end arcades are also continuous as far as the doorways. On the east, the arrangement is different, the arcades being broken by dividing strips into groups of three arches in the central portion, and of four arches in the outer portions of the building. From each of the dividing strips, of which there are six, a perpend wall of stone, 8 feet 2 inches high, with a gabled coping,¹ extended westward some 13 or 14 feet, and the easternmost arches of the two great arcades had similar walls carried across them; there were thus eight walls in all. These walls stood on a broad platform or step extending the whole length of the transept, and so divided the building into nine small chapels, from the number of whose altars it gained its name.

The middle stage contains the windows. These are tall lancets, each flanked by two tall and narrow blind lancets, all with marble shafts originally, and beautiful mouldings (Fig. 7). Each bay of the clerestory had an open arcade of a wide and two narrow arches, carried by marble shafts, corresponding to the windows below, behind which ran a wall passage. Behind this again was a lancet window with a plain pointed arch on either side (see Fig. 7). The end gables seem to have had originally two lancet windows with a wheel window above. The arrangement of the windows of the middle portion is not now evident, both the upper and lower series having been replaced by a lofty window of nine lights, the work of Abbot Darnton (1478-94); but apparently they were triplets of lancets in continuation of those right and left of them,² with probably a wheel window in the gable above the vault. The windows of the end gables were subsequently removed, and their places filled by wide windows of seven uncusped lights each (Fig. 8), no doubt by Abbot Huby, who used similar windows in his great tower (see Fig. 10).

Originally the nine altars was covered by a stone vault with Nidderdale marble keystones springing from marble shafts standing on corbels at the clerestory level. These in their turn were carried by lofty shafts starting from corbels between the windows, fixed just above the wall arcade. These shafts divided the bays. But the thrust of the vault, and its probable dangerous state, eventually led to its being taken down by Darnton, as well as the high-pitched roof, and replaced by an open roof fitted to new gables of lower pitch. Owing to an unequal settlement of the foundations of the gables, the masonry has been dislocated in parts; in two places, to such an extent as to seriously misplace the arches of the window heads. To make good the disruption, Abbot can only have fitted the bay next the east window. It is formed by the union of two diagonal main ribs with, on one side, two lesser ribs of more acute pitch that must have started from vaulting shafts between an upper triplet of the east windows.

² In the eastern guesthouse, among other Nidderdale marble keystones lying there which almost certainly belonged to the old vault of the nine altars, is one that

Darnton inserted in one window, the northernmost on the east side, a new stone elaborately carved; on the outside with a head amongst foliage issuing from the mouth, on the inside with a rose and an angel carrying a scroll lettered and dated: Anno Domini 1483. In the head of the other window, the easternmost in the south end, Darnton fixed a carving of more elaborate character. Inside, this has an angel holding a shield (the front of which has fallen off), above which is the abbot's mitred head, and over that a scroll between two fish; these in turn sustain a figure of St. James the Great. Outside is an angel with the letters Dei on his breast and holding a tun, above which is the eagle of St. John; over this again is a thick staff encircled by a scroll with this scripture (in a much contracted form): Benedicite fontes Domīno.¹ The western of the three lancets of the south gable has a plain round-headed arch built across it at three-fourths of its height up (Fig. 8); the meaning of this will be explained further on.

Having described the architectural features of the interior of the church, we will now examine its sub-divisions and ritual arrangements.

And first with regard to the nine altars. On the east side, in addition to the step or platform that the perpent walls stood on, each chapel had a step before the altar; all these, however, as well as the perpent walls, have been removed. The three northern, as well as the three southern chapels, still retain the lowest courses of their stone altars, but the three central chapels appear to have been at some time thrown into one, which also retains the base of its altar.² In the floor immediately to the south of the second and third altars, of the central altar, and of the one immediately to the south of it, is a stone, 11½ inches square, with a central sinking and drain. These floor drains appear to have been common enough throughout England, though from the repeated repavings of churches they have nearly always disappeared. There are a number of them at Rievaulx and Furness Abbeys, and one remains in the north-west tower of Wells cathedral church. The writer has also found them during excavations at Kirkham Priory, Yorkshire, and Langdon Abbey, Kent, houses of Black and White Canons respectively. There does not appear to be any rubrical direction for their use, which was probably to carry off a nevertheless to have continued to the end, for the will of Geoffrey Procter, of Nether Bordley, dated 1524, says, "I will that a vestymente with all thinges to it belongyng be bought & delyvered to the altar of Fontance, where oure Lady Messe is dailye song at the ixth altares theire." Testamenta Eboracensia (Surtees Society, 79), v. 185.

small portion of the contents of the altar cruets poured out with the intention of removing dust or other impurity.¹ All the nine altars originally set up were well furnished with almeries or lockers in the wall behind them. Thus the first altar has one to the south, and the next two altars two each, one on either side; all these have, however, been walled up. The three central altars also had two almeries each, now alternately blocked and open; the south almy to the fourth altar has holes for hinges on its bottom edge, and the corresponding almy of the sixth altar has pin holes below it. The seventh and eighth altars have each two almeries, all blocked; the latter altar has two pin holes below the south almy. The ninth altar has a blocked south almy, and in the south wall, under the second arch, are the remains of a large drain of peculiar design, the bowl of which was carried by one large and two small detached shafts. The destroyed perpent walls doubtless had a drain to the south of each altar.

At some late period the outer mouldings of all the arches behind the altars were cut off and the perpent walls taken down. The east wall was then wainscoted from end to end, and the perpent walls replaced by wooden screens dividing the chapels as before, and extending westwards some 13 feet to a parclose extending the whole length of the nine altars.²

or ambers for the safe keepinge of the vestments and ornaments belonging to everye Altar; with three or four amryes in the wall pertaining to some of the said Altars, for the same use and purpose." Rites of Durham (Surtees Society, 15), 2. Against the east walls of the presbytery and its aisles at Rievaulx Abbey were five altars divided from each other by perpent walls, 1 foot thick and 9 feet long, which were continued westwards in woodwork to meet "a faire parclose at the est end of the Church extendyng from the one syde of the Church to the other p'sshenyth the fyve alters above rehearsid." Chartulary of Rievaulx, x. 336. This parclose stood on the top of two steps forming the platform for the five altars, each of which was raised on another step with a floor drain just below. The five altars in the chapels behind the presbytery at Abbey Dore were parted by perpent walls, and some of the altar platforms in the great transept at Lincoln have them to this day. The Meaux inventory of 1396 mentions "cœlatura super tria altaria in orientali fine ecclesiæ." Chronica de Melsa, iii. lxxxii.

Besides the arrangements of the chapels, there are several other features in the nine altars to be noticed. The fifth arch (from the east) of the wall arcade in both the north and south walls contains a blocked almary; they belonged to the first and last altars respectively, each of which has only one almary in the wall behind it. In the fourth arch of the north wall is a group of seven pin holes. These were for fixing a table of some sort that had an ornamental cresting of trefoiled points, the print of which can be seen on the whitewash. To the east of this is written on the whitewash, in a hand contemporary with the building: *altare sci iacobi apli.*¹ Probably the names of the other eight altars were similarly written on the destroyed perpendicular walls. One of those to the south was the altar of St. Lawrence.²

In the second and seventh arches (counting from the south) of the west side of the southern division, at a height of 3 feet from the bench table, are two pin holes; and in the second and sixth arches (counting from the north) of the northern division, also on the west side, are two corresponding holes. The use or object of these is not clear; they may have been for fixing sconces.³

There is a large piece cut out of the north jamb of the arch from the nine altars into the south aisle of the presbytery. Perhaps a holy water stock stood here for the use of such inmates of the infirmary as came into the church for the services by that way.

We now come to the arrangements of the presbytery. A feature which appears to be peculiar to Cistercian churches is the cutting off of the aisles from the central parts by stone walls built flush with the front of the pillars. These screen-walls are to be traced not only in the naves, but where the presbyteries have been rebuilt and lengthened in later times, as at Tintern, Rievaulx, etc. they are found between the presbytery arcades also. At Tintern these walls were provided for from the first, being bonded into the piers and surmounted by a gabled coping. The arrangement at Fountains formed no exception to the rule, the aisles of the presbytery as well as the nave having been shut off by stone walls flush with the front of the piers, and returned across the east end, so as to completely cut off the nine altars. This screen-wall, as at Tintern, was bonded into the piers, and had along the front an arcade of trefoiled arches carried

The Scrope and Grosvenor Controversy (London, 1832), i. 140.

by marble shafts, like the side walls.¹ The eastern screen supported a stone gallery, about 4 feet wide, carried by an arcaded wall towards the nine altars.² The presbytery proper occupied the first four bays of the eastern arm, and was raised above the area westwards by two steps³ forming the gradus presbiterii. The wall enclosing the presbytery was solid throughout, except in the westernmost bay, where it was pierced with a double doorway on each side. West of these doorways the wall seems to have been plain, and not arcaded. The whole of the original arrangements have unfortunately been obliterated. There is, however, in the middle of the first bay a platform of several steps, made up of old paving, part of the pictum pavimentum of Abbot John of Kent. This is always pointed out as the place of the high altar; but there are no remains of the latter, nor signs of it in the arrangement of the tiling, and the whole platform is almost certainly a creation of Mr. Aislabie, made out of old material. Moreover the high altar would most likely have been placed further west, probably on the line between the first pair of piers. These have unfortunately been ruined to their bases, so we are deprived of any evidence they may have afforded in the way of cuts or pin-holes. The two eastern responds bear sundry marks of pins or hooks, mayhap for hanging curtains from. They are high up, the lowest being quite fifteen feet from the ground. There are also two holes on each side on the angles of the flat faces of these piers next the nine altars, probably for fixing sconces; they had nothing to do with the fastening of the marble shafts.⁴ The only other feature in the presbytery is a large stone coffin under the place of the third arch on the north side.

In all Cistercian churches, as in those of most other Orders, in addition to the usual doorway in the screen at the west end of the monks' quire, there was an entrance to the latter on each side from the transepts, called the upper entrance (superior introitus); the west door being called the lower entrance (inferior introitus). In churches of the early normal plan with aisleless presbyteries, where the quire extended under the crossing and into one or more bays of the nave, the upper entrances were provided by stopping the stalls a few feet

⁴ Cf. a similar arrangement at Durham:

"At the east end of Saint Cuthbert's Feretorie there was wrought uppon the height of the irons, towards the Nine Altars, very fine CANDLESTICKS of iron, like unto socketts, which had light sett in them before day, that every monke might have the more light to see to read uppon their bookes at the said nine altars when they said Masse, and also to give light to all others that came thither to heare and see the divine service." Rites of Durham (Surtees Society, 15), 5.

short of the east arch of the crossing. But in later churches with aisles to the presbytery, or where the latter has been lengthened, the entrances were often in the aisles east of the crossing.¹ At Fountains the doorways west of the presbytery proper formed the upper entrances, and the area below the gradus presbiterii thus furnished a spacious quire entry. It is possible that the germ of this later arrangement of the upper entrances may be found at Fountains in the elongated flanking chapels of the first presbytery, which were perhaps prolonged eastward to allow doorways to be pierced in them for passage from the transepts into the quire. In that case the stalls would be carried up to the eastern arch of the crossing.²

Notwithstanding the enlargement of the presbytery, there is no reason to suppose that the original extent or position of the monks' quire was altered,³ despite the statement that it was minus capax tantæ multitudinis as existed in Abbot John of York's days; chorus humilior et obscurior it doubtless was. At the Suppression, the quire occupied the whole of the crossing and the first bay of the nave, and this is almost certainly the original position. The extent of the stalls is definitely fixed by the sunk paved spaces or pits that ran beneath them. These commence under the eastern arch of the crossing and extend as far as the first piers of the nave arcade, where they are returned against the quire screen. Only a few fragments of the screen remain. At the east end of the stalls on each side is a stone step, worn with the tread of feet. There also remains on the north side the beginning of a narrow stair to a loft or pew over the upper entrance. A like arrangement exists at Furness, but there the stair is in the north transept.⁴ To allow of easy entry to the stalls, Abbot Darnton's moulded plinth of the south respond has been partly cut away, and the north respond was similarly treated. Between these responds, there lies a large marble grave-stone with the casement of a brass of

² At Buildwas, where the presbytery is aisleless, the holes shew that the Lenten veil hung across the arch from the crossing. At Tintern, where the presbytery is short, there are holes in the pillars twelve feet up, apparently for a screen or beam across the east arch of the crossing; the gradus presbiterii was on the same line.

an abbot beneath a canopy. The effigy is always described as mitred, and has been so engraved. As a matter of fact, the abbot was represented in his monastic habit, with his crosier in his hand, and over his head, but not on it, was figured his mitre.¹ The slab, according to Mr. Walbran,² was discovered in 1840 by some workmen employed in the abbey, who were anxious to find hidden treasure. Part of it was then taken up, and found to cover a grave containing a skeleton. The position of the slab is described by Mr. Walbran as "within the foundation of the porch of the screen, between the nave and choir"; but he has evidently mistaken the steps to the stalls for the remains of a screen, and confounded the quire with the presbytery. Neither the subsequent discovery of portions of the actual pulpitum nor of the flagged space under the stalls caused him to see his error. He accordingly has endeavoured to identify the slab as that of John Ripon, who was abbot from 1414 to 1434-5, but is expressly recorded to have been buried in the nave, where his two immediate successors were laid in line with him. Independently of this, the brass was some forty or fifty years later, and must have commemorated some other abbot. The choice seems to lie between John Greenwell, 1442-1471, and Thomas Swinton, who was elected in 1471, but resigned in 1478-9. Now the placing of the mitre over the abbot's head may be a piece of Cistercian humility, but it may also indicate that the abbot had ceased to wear it. Under what circumstances Abbot Greenwell's rule ended we do not know, but Thomas Swinton certainly resigned his office, and it is very likely that the slab is his.³

It is recorded that Abbot Robert Burlay, who died in 1410, "sepelitur in choro in medio ante stallas abbatis et prioris."⁴ This would, of course, be at the western end of the quire.

The steps at the east end of the stalls, most of the masonry of the pits, and the fragments of the quire screen or pulpitum, are of a peculiar white or cream-coloured limestone used at Fountains only by Abbot Huby (1494-1526). It is important to bear this in mind in tracing the architectural history of the building.

The remains of the screen, with the portions of the pits in front of it, and about 7 feet of the returns of the latter eastward, were laid bare in 1854, and much excitement was caused by the discovery, on the north and Huby, and two very rich ones are described in the inventory of the abbey. See Memorials of Fountains, i. 289, 290.

² Memorials of Fountains, i. 147.

side, of nine earthen pots imbedded in the sides of the masonry of the pit. It is now generally admitted that these pots were placed here for supposed acoustic properties.¹ Oddly enough, although the then excavators had a flagged bottom to guide them, they did not follow up the clearing of the pits, which remained filled with rubbish until September, 1888, when the writer had them cleared out. It then appeared that the pots had originally extended along the whole of the north wall of the pit, for nine more or less perfect additional examples were found, and at such distances apart as to shew that the series, when complete, included twenty-four pots, corresponding to the probable number of stalls, three against the screen, and twenty at the side, or forty-six stalls in all.² On the south side of the quire there were not any pots. There were no pits for a second row of stalls, but it probably originally existed, for at Meaux, in 1396, the choir was fitted stallis superioribus ex utraque parte chori xxv. et aliis xvij. bassioribus monachorum.³ It is very likely that at the time Abbot Huby refitted the quire, the numbers at Fountains had become so reduced that, as at Furness, one row of stalls on each side was enough.

The quire was also used by the novices. Thus the statute in the Consuetudines, Quo ordine benedicatur aqua, mentions "novicii qui ante formas consistunt"; and at Clairvaux, a visitor in 1517 says: "Audict chœur, où chantent les religieux et novisses seulement, y a cent vingt huit chaises pour lesdicts religieux et novisses."⁴

The screen-wall between the pillars of the nave was 23 inches thick⁵, but the height cannot be definitely ascertained. It was not bonded into the pillars, but was provided for from the first, for the base-molds are only complete on the aisle side, and are stopped off where they would have been covered by the wall⁶ (see Fig. 4). The western responds have the base-molds complete, shewing that the wall did not entirely block up the last arches as it did the others.¹ No part of the wall now remains ; in fact, as will presently be shewn, its use had departed, and the wall been entirely removed, except in the first arch on each side, some time before the Suppression.²

The whole of the pillars of the nave will be found on examination to bear a remarkable number of cuts and holes, in many cases with others corresponding to them in the side walls. These have never been fully described, nor in fact had they been noticed until Mr. Micklethwaite pointed out the principal ones in his paper on The Cistercian Plan.³ They nevertheless furnish most important evidence of the positions of screens and other features, and even the most insignificant are worth notice. Some caution must, however, be used in deducing evidence from them, as their relative dates are not easy to make out.

Owing to the number of these cuts it will be convenient to describe those first which tell of the arrangements and subdivisions of the nave.

The first pair of pillars have each a large piece cut out of their bases for the insertion of a stone wall or screen crossing the nave at the west end of the choir. A few fragments of this screen remain,⁴ built of the white limestone used by Huby.

The second pair of pillars have each a large notch or cut, 17 inches wide, in the bases for a screen across the nave,⁵ and there are other cuts shewing that screens also crossed the aisles on the same line.

The first and second pillars on both sides of the nave have holes high up for a pair of beams or joists crossing the arch ; and it is clear that the space between the two transverse screens was floored over to form a loft or gallery.⁶ On the north this loft was carried right up to the aisle wall, where there are two holes above the stringcourse for the

beams to support it. This combination of screens and loft formed the pulpitum.

On the loft stood the organs, apparently in the north end, for there are holes for a large beam crossing the arch about 16 feet from the ground, and just above the abacus of each pillar, on the nave side, is a deep square hole with pin-holes on each side; there are also other pin-holes in the wall above. As there are no corresponding holes on the south side these may have been for fixing up the front of the organ case, while the bellows and other parts of the instrument may well have stood in the loft behind in the aisle.¹

The space beneath the loft formed a lobby or quire entry, closed at each end by a screen across the arch,² and against the western side of the second screen there were probably two altars on either side a central doorway, as at Furness, Roche, Revesby, and other Cistercian abbeys. These altars were no doubt those of St. Mary (probably on the north) and St. Bernard (probably on the south), between which Abbot Thomas Paslew is stated to have been buried in 1442: "In navi ecclesiæ ante introitum Chori quasi in medio inter altare sanctæ Mariæ et altare sancti Bernardi humanæ traditur sepulturæ."³ Further west lay Abbot John Ripon, who died in 1434-5 and was buried "ante introitum Chori in Navi ecclesiæ."⁴ Between them lay Abbot John Martyn (ob. 1442), of whom it is recorded: "sepelitur in Navi ecclesiæ inter Johannem Rypon et Thomam Paslew quondam Abbates."⁵ He succeeded Abbot Paslew, but died seven weeks after his election.

Both the second pillars have their bases cut right down on the west side, probably for the platforms of the altars flanking the quire door.

The third pair of pillars have the bases cut down on the nave side, and have holes for the screens that enclosed the altars of St. Mary and St. Bernard. There were other screens, of stone, crossing the aisles at this point.

¹ At Buildwas the pulpitum seems to have also filled the second bay of the nave, and across the second arch on the south are holes for beams which probably carried the organs. In this case the pulpitum stood on a platform two steps high extending across the nave and aisles, with, apparently, low screens in the aisles on the line of the west wall of the pulpitum. There was also a low screen crossing both nave and aisles on the line of the third pair of pillars. There seem to have been similar lofts for the organs at Furness, Revesby, and Roche. At Tintern there are two carved corbels over the pulpitum (which was in line with the first pair of piers) just above the stringcourse of the clerestory on the south side, which had something to do with the organs; here and at Buildwas, as well as at Fountains, the organs were on the side of the nave remote from the cloister. At Exeter, the so-called "minstrels' gallery" in the north clerestory of the nave probably held a pair of organs, and there is a similar gallery on the south side of the nave at Wells. The projection from the south triforium of the nave of Malmesbury Abbey was also doubtless used for the same purpose.

³ Memorials of Fountains, i. 147.

⁵ Ibid. i. 147.

The fourth bay probably formed the retrochorus for the infirm monks, and it agrees well with the direction as to how they were to go up to the gradus presbiterii for holy water: "Qui vero extra chorum vel in retro chorum fuerint veniant per superiorem introitum chori. et per medium chorum revertantur;" that is, they were to go round through the transept to the upper entrance, but were to return direct to the retro-quire per medium chorum.

The bases of the pillars of the fourth arch on each side are cut down in a way strongly suggestive of some large structure having stood in each arch. Perhaps there were seats here such as existed at Clairvaux.¹

The fourth pair of pillars have the front of their bases more or less cut down, and each has also a notch for a third transverse screen, against which probably stood the Rood-altar. It was flanked on either side by an altar built against the pillar, and a little in front of it, eleven feet from the ground, a large beam crossed the church to carry the Rood itself.² There are numerous pin-holes on the west and south faces of the north pillar, and also on the west side of that opposite.

The fifth north pillar has two notches wide apart on the east side of its base, and the latter is cut down on the south side. Against the western face are the remains of an altar, with various cuts above where the reredos was fixed. The opposite pillar has both the east and north sides of the base cut down, and on its west face are plain marks of the reredos of an altar.

¹ They could hardly have been tombs, for I failed to find any signs of a grave on digging below the north arch. At Clairvaux in 1517 it is recorded: "Au bout dudict chœur, pour tirer en la nef et chœur des convers, y a séparation entre icculx deux chœurs, en laquelle séparation y a trente-quatre chayes pour seoir à oyr le service les vielz et debilles religieux; au bout de laquelle séparation y a ung grant autel de la Trinité, dessus lequel est le crucifix de l'église." Didron, Annales Archéologiques, iii. 227. It may be worth while noting that at Durham, where there was a rood screen with the Jesus altar against it, as well as the pulpitum at the west end of the choir, "on the backsyle of the said Rood before the Queir dore there was a LOFT, and in under the said loft, by the wall, there was a long forme, which dyd reche from the one Roode dore to the other, where men dyd sytt to rest themselves on and say there praiers and here devyne service." Rites of Durham (Surtees Society, 15), 29. This agrees exactly with the arrangement at Clairvaux, and I have also found the same at Castleacre Priory, a Cluniac house in Norfolk.

² The fence screen to the Rood-altar at Fountains was probably of the same character as the one that enclosed the Jesus (or nave) altar at Durham: "at either ende of the Alter was closed up with fyne wainscott, like unto a porch, adjoyninge to eyther roode dore, verie finely vernished with fyne read vernishe And in the north end of the Alter, in the wainscott, there was a dore to come in to the said porch and a locke on yt, to be lockt both daie and nighte Also the fore parte of the said porch, from the utmost corner of the porch to the other, ther was a dore with two brode leves to open from syde to syde, all of fyne joined and through-carved worke. The height of yt was sumthinge above a mans brest; and in the highte of the said dore yt was all stricken full of iron piks, that no man shold clymme over, which dore did hing all in gymmers, and clasps in the insyde to claspe theme." Rites of Durham (Surtees Society, 15), 28.

With the exception of a small notch in the base on the nave side of the sixth pillar, the remaining pillars of the north arcade are entire. A bracket for an image has, however, been inserted by Abbot Huby in the south-east face of the seventh pillar.

The sixth south pillar has the remains of an altar against its western face, with pin-holes for a reredos or table above, and over that an inserted bracket for an image. The rest of the south pillars are entire towards the nave.

The western responds have each two deep cuts in the bases on the nave side, and there is a small beamhole in the inner jamb of the two recesses in the west wall. These point to the existence of a screen crossing the church in front of the great door, maybe "for warmth," which also carried a loft or gallery. What is seemingly a fragment of the base of the screen remains on the south, with part of the tile-floor in front. There are plain marks of a western gallery at Buildwas, and both there and at Fountains it probably held a pair of organs; for at Meaux, in 1396, we find there were organa majora in occidentali fine ecclesie, as well as organa minora in choro.¹

It may be convenient here to recapitulate the principal arrangements of the nave.

The first bay contains the western end of the monks' quire. The second bay was filled by the pulpitum, with central doorway and two flanking altars. The third bay contained the chapels enclosing these altars, with a passage between them. The fourth bay formed the retro-quire. Between the fourth pair of pillars was the Rood-screen with central altar and two doorways; and an altar flanking it under the arch on each side. There were other altars against the fifth north pillar, and the fifth and sixth south pillars. At the west end was a gallery for the greater organs.

In addition to the above features, there exists in the floor, under the turf, 3 feet 4 inches in front of each arcade, commencing on the line of the west side of the tenth pair of pillars and extending eastward to the middle of the sixth pillar, a row of twenty-three slabs of the white limestone peculiar to Abbot Huby's work, each 27 inches square and incised with a circle, with intervals of 11 inches between them. A little further east are two other squares, only 11 feet 7 inches apart, and 1 foot 10 inches in front of them a single square in the middle. These stones were first discovered during the excavations of 1854, and Mr. Walbran also mentions another stone in front of the west door. The writer also uncovered most of the stones in 1887, in order to lay down their positions accurately on the ground plan, but failed to find the stone before the door.

These remarkable rows of stones are certainly for the better ordering of processions, and most probably for the station made during the Sunday procession in front of the great cross. Similar rows of stones remained at York, Wells and Lincoln, until swept away when the naves of those cathedral churches were repaved in the last century.¹

The arrangements of the aisles must now be considered.

The arch into the north transept has already been stated to have been closed by a screen. The respond of the first arch has a curious series of holes on its west face for fastenings of some sort, and the chamfered plinth of the first pillar opposite has also two holes in for plugs or pins. Above these are two notches in the base, about 2 feet apart.

Between the second and third bays was, as already stated, a screen in line with the west face of the pulpitum, and on the north face of the pillar are sundry marks of metal fastenings. Against the screen, as in other cases, was doubtless an altar, though all traces of it are now gone.

Another stone screen crossed the aisle at the third pillar, the base of which is cut out for its insertion. A beam-hole in the wall, about 8 feet up, and a corresponding cut in the pillar indicate the height of the screen, against which was no doubt an altar.

Across at the fourth pillar was another stone screen with a beam in front of it above, and against it an altar.

The fifth pillar also bears marks of a transverse screen, the beam holes for which shew it was 9 feet high.

In the wall opposite the sixth pillar are two pin holes, 21 inches apart and $5\frac{1}{2}$ feet from the floor.

A precisely similar arrangement existed at Lincoln, where the stones were thirty-seven a side. See Camden's Britannia, ed. R. Gough (London, 1789), ii. pl. viii. p. 256, and second edition (London, 1806), ii. pl. xi. p. 368. An unpublished plan of the cathedral church of Wells, made for the Society of Antiquaries by John Carter in 1799, shews two rows of eleven circular stones on each side in front of the seventh, eighth, and ninth arches of the nave. At Canterbury "two parallel lines cut in the pavement, about eight feet asunder," served the same purpose. See Gostling's A Walk in and about the City of Canterbury, second edition (Canterbury, 1777), 203. They were destroyed when the nave was repaved in 1787-8.

The arch into the transept from the south aisle had a stone screen, inside which, against the aisle wall on the south, stood the holy-water stock. This was a beautiful thirteenth century marble bason, quatrefoil in plan, standing on a clustered pier also quatrefoil in section. The bason, after doing duty as the font for many years in the neighbouring chapel of Aldfield, is now in the abbey museum, but its base is still in place; it has a hole in the centre for a metal dowel, and there are holes above in the wall as if for fixing a canopy to keep out the dust.¹

The third bay was a chapel. It had, as has been said, a screen across at the second pillar, and there are great cuts in the latter for the reredos, and holes for its beams opposite. There is also a small pointed recess in the wall for a drain, with a descending cut from it. A little to the west of this are two pin holes, 2 feet apart and 7 feet from the ground, probably for suspending a jack towel. Opposite the south-east angle of the third pillar are two beam holes in the wall, one at the floor level, the other about $5\frac{1}{2}$ feet up, but none corresponding in the pillar.

The fourth bay was also a chapel. Its altar stood against a stone screen from the third pillar, which, as well as the aisle wall, bears plain marks of the reredos. In the south wall was a large pointed drain, and to the west of it are two pin holes for a jack towel, as in the third bay.

The fifth bay seems to have been closed by a stone screen on the east. Over this, about 10 feet up, was a wooden beam, and a little in front, at the same height, a slender beam or rod; these were probably for fixing a ceiling or canopy over the altar. The chapel in this bay was closed on the west by a screen from the eastern shaft of the fifth pillar.

On the aisle wall in the sixth bay are some beam holes and inserted stones not easy to explain.

The sixth pillar has on marks or cuts other than the chamfering off of the south-east angle of its base.

¹ It is worth while comparing the arrangement at Fountains with that at Durham, where there were two holy water stones in the nave, "all of verie faire blewe marble." One was near the north door, "being joyned unto the pillar, servinge all those that came that waie to here divyne service." The other "stood within the south church door," as at Fountains, "servinge the Prior and all the Convent with the whole house." It was "not altogether so curyouse" as the former, but had in the wainscot against which it stood "a brattishing very fynely and curiously wrought, and all gilte as fyne as the angell, and in the mydes of the saide brattyshing ther was a great starre of a great compasse, like unto the sonne, very artificially and most curiously gilt and ennamyled, very goodly to all the beholders therof, so that there coule no duste nor fylthe falle into the Holy Water stone, it was so close above head, and so close within the Church doure." Rites of Durham (Surtees Society, 15), 32, 33, 35.

The seventh pillar has some pin holes on its east face, and there was a screen from it across the aisle about 7 feet 6 inches high. There was also a screen across from the ninth pillar. The rest of the aisle was open.¹

The whole of the nave was paved with small plain square tiles.

With regard to the original arrangements of the nave, and the use to which it was put, it has been pointed out that the first bay formed the western part of the monks' quire, and that the latter probably occupied the same place from the twelfth century to the Suppression. In later times, as we have seen, the three next bays were cut off by transverse screens. If, however, one may judge by the indications of these screens where the first arrangements remained to the end, as at Kirkstall, Buildwas, Tintern, etc. it is probable that at Fountains, as in the examples cited, two bays only were screened off, leaving the eight westernmost bays to be accounted for.

Although the documentary evidence of the use of the nave is but slight, there is clear proof that it formed the quire of the conversi or lay brothers. Thus at Meaux, a daughter house of Fountains, the inventory of 1396 includes among the ornamenta ecclesiæ, in addition to the monks' stalls, aliis stallis superioribus ex utraque parte et bassioribus ex utraque parte conversorum in occidentali parte ecclesiæ.² So too at Clairvaux in 1517, below the nave altar, which was dedicated to the Holy Trinity, we are told: "à la descente dudict autel est le chœur et siège des convers, et sont lesdicts sièges en nombre de trois cens xxviii, que sont à trois rengées, assavoir: les haults, les moyens et les bas. Lesquels sièges occupent tout la nef de ladict eglise, jusques au bout d'icelle eglise, où est la grande porte."³

No explanation has hitherto been given of the screen wall between the pillars of a Cistercian church, but since the nave was the quire of the conversi it is quite clear that the wall was to place the stalls

² Chronica de Melsa, iii. lxxxii. The numbers are unfortunately not given, as in the case of the monks' stalls already cited, blank spaces being left for them in the MS. The monks' stalls at Meaux were put in during the abbacy of Michael de Brun, 1235-49, and those of the conversi in the time of Abbot William of Driffild, 1249-69. The high altar was not hallowed until 1253. The Chronica de Melsa contains other references to the chorus conversorum. Thus among Abbot Hugh's works, 1339-49, is a most interesting account of a new crucifix of great beauty in choro conversorum, which had been carved from a nude model. Miracles were performed by it, and even women were allowed to visit it (iii. 35). On Abbot Hugh's death he was buried in medio chori conversorum coram crucifixo quem fecit exallari (iii. 37).

³ Didron, Annales Archéologiques, iii. 227.

against, like the similar walls to be seen at Canterbury and elsewhere behind the quire stalls. The writer has also found them at Repton, a priory of Black Canons, where they are contemporary with and bonded into the piers, and at Langdon, an abbey of White Canons. A solid wall behind the stalls is not therefore peculiar to the Cistercians, but as no other Order appears to have used the nave as a quire for the conversi, the walling off the nave aisles may be looked upon as a Cistercian feature.

It has already been pointed out that on both sides of the church the plinths of the third, fourth, and fifth pillars are chopped down on the nave side. This has clearly been done to fit stalls against them. Now this can hardly have been for the original quire of the monks, since, with the bay between the two transverse screens, no less than six bays must then be allotted to it, which is too much. The more reasonable alternative seems, therefore, to be that the three bays in question contained the quire of the conversi, probably at some late date, when new stalls were built for them, and their original numbers were reduced. The longitudinal wall must have disappeared by then, and been replaced where necessary by wooden screens.

In the use of the nave as the quire of the conversi we have an explanation of the stopping short of the screen wall in the last or westernmost bay, since the conversi here entered their quire from their dorter in the western range of buildings. This is clearly shown at Tintern, where the last south arch was closed by the wall, but the north was left open for the entry of the lay brothers, whose lodging is there on the north side.

On reference to the plan, it will be seen from the arrangements of altars against and screens between the pillars, as well as the position of the procession stones, that some time before the Suppression the nave was no longer used as the quire of the conversi, and that their stalls had been removed. There was therefore no need for the screen wall, which was also cleared away, except in the first arch on each side, where the westernmost of the monks' stalls stood against it.¹ It is probable that these alterations were effected by Abbot Huby (1494-1526),

Fig. 9.—Slab with initials and devices of Abbot Marmaduke Huby found in the church, now in the Abbey Museum. The bird is probably meant for a hoby or small hawk, and as a rebus.

who, besides refitting the quire, certainly laid down the procession stones and built some of the screens and altars.

The west wall of the nave has a large round-headed door of six richly-moulded orders, with jamb-shafts and carved capitals. This is flanked by two broad pilaster-buttresses, stopping short at the springing line of the gabled roof, and having between them Darnton's great window. Over the window is a large niche with a mutilated figure of Our Lady and Child, carried by a corbel carved with Darnton's rebus; an eagle of St. John holding a crosier and perched on a tun, with a scroll lettered DEHN 1494. The ends of the aisles are blank, with flanking pilasters; the north aisle has, however, a blocked doorway.

Extending across the whole width of the front are the remains of a stone porch $12\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide. On the south side it abuts against a wall of uncertain length running westwards from the south angle of the front, but on the north it is bonded into the wall; thus shewing that it was an afterthought, not contemplated when the south aisle was built, but before the north aisle was finished. The end walls were solid, but the front had one if not two stories of round-headed arches carried by twin shafts set on a low wall. The arches now standing have been reconstructed from the old stones found during the excavations. In the middle was a wide entrance-arch carried by triple jamb-shafts with inner and outer flanking-shafts. This arch was, at a later period, fitted with doors. The roof of the porch was a lean-to, extending up to the sill of the great west window.

This western porch existed at Clairvaux, Pontigny, and many other abbeys abroad; and in this country, besides Fountains, at Newminster, Rievaulx, and Byland. At Rievaulx it is described in the Suppression survey as "the house or portche at the west end of the Church," and had a leaded roof.¹ At Byland² it was called the Galilee, and Mr. Walbran quotes the will of one William Tiplady, 1426, who desires to be buried in the Galilee of the abbey of St. Mary at Byland.³ It was also a favourite burial-place at Fountains, as may be seen by the slabs still covering the stone coffins remaining at either end. The western porch was, however, not a universal feature, for there are no signs of it at Tintern, Kirkstall, or Valle Crucis.

² At Byland clear traces of the porch remain in the toothings for the end walls and the corbels for the roof below the nave windows. The roof was of the same height across the north aisle and the nave, but it was dropped several feet across the south aisle.

³ Memorials of Fountains, ii. pt. i. 204.

The north side of the nave and the western side of the north transept have pilaster buttresses between the windows, rising from the plinth, which has also two curious rudimentary pilasters in each bay

(see Fig. 12). These pilasters once extended all round the Norman church. Below the windows is a plain stringcourse, and there is another at the line of the springing of their heads, round which it is continued as a hood-mold. Both stringcourses are carried round the buttresses. The walls had no parapets, but were surmounted by corbel-tables, portions of which remain, below the eaves of the roofs.

Outside the north transept is the magnificent tower built by Huby to supersede the central one (Fig. 10). It is about 170 feet high, and opens into the church by a lofty arch of four orders with bold hood-mold, with ugly capitals and stilted bases. Internally the tower is divided by projecting courses into four stories, but has lost all its floors and roof, if these were ever put in. In the north-east angle is a circular vice, entered by a four-centred door with square label at the east end of the north wall. This runs up to the second story only, where it stops. The ascent is continued by another vice beginning in the north-west corner of the second story, and carried thence to the battlements, with doors in the third and fourth stories. The first story has on the south the great arch to the church, and opposite, a large pointed five-light window with transom and tracery; the east and west sides each contain a pointed three-light window. The second story has on the south a two-light window with four-centred head, and similar windows, but of three lights, in the other sides. The upper part of this story has a projecting course all round to carry the lower timbers of the belfry-floor above. The third or belfry story has on all four sides a large pointed four-light window with tracery in the head. The fourth story, of no great height, is lighted by plain square-headed windows of three lights on the east and west, and by one of four lights on the south; on the north it has not any window (Fig. 11).

Externally the boldly projecting buttresses, as well as the walls, have a great moulded plinth running all round. The buttresses are divided into five stages by set-offs, each with a gabled and crocketed head surmounting a plain niche for an image. The highest stages stop short some distance below the parapet, and are surmounted by large panelled pinnacles set diagonally. The sides of the tower are divided as within into five stories, diminishing directly as the height. The lowest story has over the east and west windows small niches, now empty, surmounted by angels holding shields. On the east the shield is charged with three horseshoes, and that on the west with a mitre enfiled with a crosier between the letters M H in chief, for Marmaduke Huby. Over the great north window is a niche with an image of St. Katherine. The windows of the second story have also small niches over them; that on the south with an image of an abbot (perhaps Huby, or may be St. Bernard, as there is no mitre), that on the north with the image of St. James the Great. The windows in this story are deeply recessed. The battlements were pierced with quatrefoils, and in addition to the pair of pinnacles at each corner there was a great one behind them and a lesser one in the middle of each side set athwart the battlement. Immediately below the parapet is a broad band containing inscriptions in black letter, and below each of the two uppermost stories is also a band with inscriptions. These lower inscriptions are legible enough, but the topmost band, though apparently legible as seen from the ground, is really much decayed, and Mr. Walbran speaks of it as being "so weather-beaten as to be illegible." After many attempts the writer has succeeded in deciphering parts of these topmost inscriptions, as follows:¹

East side:

*Sit nomen domini ihesu xpi benedictum*²

North side:

*En nomine ihesu xpi . . . g . . . atur . . . infernorum.*³

West side:

The middle band of inscriptions is:

The lowest band of inscriptions reads:

There is no third legend on the south side.

All the above sentences are from the Cistercian breviarium, where they occur in the daily offices of Lauds, Prime, and Vespers. The numerals in brackets severally denote the following shields of arms :

(1) Three horseshoes. These arms have hitherto been considered as those of the abbey, but no example earlier than Huby's time is known, and they are more probably his personal arms than those of the monastery. If they be the abbey arms, whence are they derived and what do they mean? They occur on none of the abbey seals. It should be noticed too that, both on the tower as well as in the south transept, they are associated with Huby's initials.

(2) Two bendlets within a bordure.

(3) A maunch, over all a bend. Norton, of Norton Conyers.¹

(4) A cross flory between in the first and second quarters a mitre, and in the third and fourth a key erect. These most probably are the real arms of Fountains Abbey. In both places where they occur, it will be noticed they are associated with the shield charged with three horseshoes. The mitre and key, surmounted by a crosier, occur on a small signet used by Huby.

None of the windows is cusped, and the detail generally is very coarse, but for stateliness and good proportion, Huby's great tower at Fountains has few equals of its date.

On the east side of the great tower are the remains of a building, apparently an addition north of the transept of the fourteenth century, destroyed when the tower was built. The small fragment left has a doorway in the middle of the east wall, and the springers of the vault of its low basement. There was an upper floor. This building may have been the vestry or the sacrist's checker, but too little remains to shew its true character.

The transept chapels had each a gable over the windows, with a corbel table up the slopes (Fig. 12). This is not an English feature, and is probably due to the influence of Geoffrey of Clairvaux. On the south side the wall has been raised between and above the gables to form a room over the vaults of the chapels. This room has a window to the south, but is otherwise too much ruined to enable its arrangement to be made out. It was entered by a wall passage from the great vice in the south transept gable.

The presbytery aisle windows had detached jamb-shafts, and the intermediate buttresses have the angles chamfered off from the first string upwards. On the north side, the buttresses terminated in lofty slender gables, and the windows were also designed for gables, probably in imitation of those over the transept chapels (see Fig. 6). On the south the buttresses have low gabled heads and the stump of a pinnacle behind, and over the windows is a horizontal corbel table to carry the parapet. From each buttress was a flying arch to the presbytery wall to carry the thrust of the vault.

The windows and buttresses of the nine altars are like those of the presbytery, but the clerestory windows are quite plain. The buttresses were all gabled, and probably had pinnacles behind. The north and south doors are round-headed and richly moulded, with triple jamb-shafts and three flanking shafts on each side. They are built out a little from the main wall.

The two main buttresses of the east front were increased in projection and adorned with pinnacles by Abbot John Darnton when the arches behind them in the nine altars were rebuilt. The buttresses between the lights of the original eastern triplet were very small, but their height is uncertain. The southernmost buttress of the front has a wide chase cut out about half-way up, and just beneath the stringcourse there are other and deeper cuts. These have clearly formed the abutments of a flying buttress, since destroyed, built in line with the south wall to withstand the spreading of the gable.¹ The site of the buttress is marked by two coffin lids, one reversed, which have been utilized in the foundation.

It will be seen from an examination of the unaltered buttresses of the front that each has in it a cut, above half-way up, for a raking timber shore. These shores were probably inserted by way of precaution when the spreading of the vault was first noticed, and remained until the groining was taken down and permanent buttresses added to the front. The flying buttress was probably then removed also.

Against the south side of the presbytery, a room, some 49 feet long and 13 feet wide, was built by Abbot Huby, but unfortunately only the lowest courses of the walls remain. It had an entrance porch on the south, with perhaps a pentice to the small door in the vestry in the south transept, and was covered by a lean-to roof, which cut off some 2 feet of the aisle windows. Probably this was built to replace the building outside the north transept, destroyed by Huby to make way for his new tower.

The gable of the south transept, after the fire of 1147, was covered up to the springing of its window heads by the new dorter roof, which cut across the lines of both windows, but more of the west than the east, because its ridge was not in line with that of the transept. Sundry doors, etc. in the gable wall will be dealt with when speaking of the dorter.

The remainder of this side of the church will be more properly described when dealing with the cloister and western buildings.

THE INFIRMARY.

On the south-east of the abbey church are the remains of an extensive group of buildings, which have until lately been almost invariably described as the abbot's house. But from comparison with other plans, especially of such large Benedictine monasteries as Canterbury, Westminster, Peterborough, etc. it is certain that these buildings are actually those of the monks' infirmary (infirmatorium).

The monastic infirmary, or "farmery," as it was more shortly called in England, was, as its name implies, not only the hospital for the sick, but also the abode of the infirm monks, and such as had been professed fifty years (sempectu). It was, further, the temporary lodging from time to time of the minuti, or monks who had been let blood. This operation was undergone by the Cistercian monks in companies four times in the year, usually in February, April, September, and about Midsummer-day, but not during harvest, nor in Advent or Lent, nor the first three days of Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost. For the accommodation of these several companies of the convent, an establishment of some size was necessary: and the great infirmaries at Canterbury, Peterborough, and Fountains were probably fully tenanted when the monastic fervour was at its height. According to the Consuetudines, the minuti among the Cistercians did not go into farmery, but remained in cloister and took their meals in the frater. But probably by the time these infirmaries were built at Fountains and elsewhere, they were used in the same way as in other Orders. In later times, when the number of the monks had diminished, the farmery seems to have been devoted to other purposes as well.

The infirmary at Fountains was directly connected with the cloister by a covered passage or gallery nearly two hundred feet long, from which a second passage, at right angles, led to the southern door of the nine altars.¹ These passages are of several dates, and have also been partly rebuilt and much altered in later times. It will therefore be more convenient first to describe the infirmary itself.

Of the infirmary which must have existed, in some form or other, before the fire of 1147, there is no record; and nothing remains to mark its site or tell whether it was of stone or of wood. The first mention of the infirmary is the account of its building by Abbot John of Kent (1220-1247); it is therefore probable that he first built it of stone.²

Owing to the contraction of the valley of the Skell, the river is forced so near the abbey, after passing the end of the monks' dorter, that there was no room between it and the church upon which to build a farmery of any size; and as it was impossible to deflect the stream without encroaching upon the cemetery, the abbot boldly constructed four great parallel tunnels for the river to flow through, and by cutting away the side of the hill on the south, and building out a platform on the north, made a convenient site for his infirmary. The western parts of the tunnels, for about seventy-five feet, run towards the north-east, and then turn at an angle of twenty-five degrees and run eastwards for the rest of their length. When first built, the two northern tunnels were at least 240 feet long, and the other two were about twenty feet shorter. They are ten feet in width, and the same in height, constructed throughout of ashlar, with rubble barrel vaults and stone paving. The ends have, however, gradually fallen in, and the southernmost tunnel is now blocked up towards the west by the collapse of its vault. The river still flows through the other three tunnels.

The principal building of the farmery was a great hall, 170 feet long and 70 feet wide, standing north and south, and consisting of a central nave of eight bays, with a broad aisle running all round. The nave was divided from the aisles by eight arches on each side and two at each end, carried by piers formed of a central pillar with a detached marble shaft on each of the cardinal faces, and standing on a square plinth or base. At each corner of the nave the arcades abut against a pair of buttresses projecting into the aisle. The nave must have been lighted by a clerestory. The principal entrance of the hall was a rich doorway towards the north end of the west wall, opening from the long passage or gallery already mentioned. The doorway had five orders carried by detached marble shafts, but unfortunately only the bases now remain. The whole of the great hall is so ruined that until its site was excavated in 1849-50, no remains of it were visible. Nearly all of the west wall has gone, and what is left of the east wall is much obscured by later alterations. The south end remains to a height of about six feet, having been left as a retaining wall to the bank, and the base of the north end, though ruined to the floor level within, still retains its plinth and three courses of masonry without, which escaped through being built against the great platform where it overlooked the cemetery. The arcades are also completely destroyed, and only a few of the bases of the piers are left. At each end of the hall, in the aisles, was a large fireplace; and that is all that can be said with certainty as to the original arrangements of the building.

At Louth Park, Richard of Dunham, abbot 1227-1246, "in primo siquidem adventu suo fecit Infirmatorium Monachorum, et Cameram grave infirmancium. Coquinam, et cetera ibidem necessaria." Chronicon Abbatis de Parco Lude (Lincolnshire Record Society), 13. At Croxden the farmery was built during the abbacy of Walter of London, 1242-1269.

During the fourteenth century sundry changes were made in the hall and other buildings of the infirmary. The alterations in the hall, so far as they can now be traced, consisted in walling off portions, if not all, of the aisles and cutting them up into small rooms furnished with fireplaces. The base of one of the partitions, with the sill of the doorway from the hall, remains in the second arch from the north of the east arcade, and there are fragments of others elsewhere, with some of the fireplaces. This cutting up of the great hall into a number of private rooms was one of the many changes made in later times to make the place more comfortable; and there is also proof of it at Meaux, where it is recorded of Abbot William of Scarborough (1372-1396) that "cameras privatas in infirmitorio monachorum separari et inhabitari per singulas instituit."¹ Similar and further changes, all in the direction of greater comfort, were made in the infirmary hall at Fountains in the time of Abbot Huby.²

houses, as at Canterbury, Ely, and Peterborough. At Westminster the infirmary hall was rebuilt in the form of a cloister, with chambers round it.

It will be easiest to follow the various changes by describing in detail the remains of the great hall. The north arcade has merely the plinths of its responds, and the foundation of the intermediate pier. The north respond of the east arcade is ruined to its base. Between it and the first pier commences a large staircase, to be described presently. The base of the first pier is whole; on its south-west corner is the stump of an iron pin run in with lead. Between this and the next pier, the base of which is also complete, is the lowest course of a partition wall of the fourteenth century, with the sill of a doorway from the hall. The base of the second pier has the lower stone cut down on the south side towards the east, and upon its north-west corner is a lead plug. The third, fifth and sixth piers have been completely destroyed, and of the fourth only the foundation remains. The seventh pier is complete, having been set up again from stones found during the excavations of 1849-50; its height is, however, doubtful. The south respond, as well as the rest of the south-east pier, has also been rebuilt with old material, but its height is conjectural. The base of the central south pier is complete. Against the front of it is a block of Huby's white limestone, with two oblong holes on top, with sloping bottoms; the object of this is uncertain.¹ Near it stands a broken trough, also of the white limestone used by Huby, and the eight-sided top of a chimney found in the excavations. The western respond has the south-east corner of its base cut off, and with the rest of the pier is complete for a few courses up. The southernmost arch of the western arcade was closed by a partition wall of Huby's work, the base of which remains. Against the south half of its east side is a large block of masonry with rounded end, also built by Huby, on which something has stood, but the whole is too knocked about for anything definite to be made out. Perhaps it was the foot of a stair, or the base of a fireplace of an upper chamber. The seventh pier from the north retains its base, and a few of the courses above it. From it to the sixth pier was a partition; but both the sixth and the fifth piers have themselves utterly perished. The fourth pier has its base complete, and part of its central shaft has been set up; on its south side is a block of Huby's white limestone, which formed one side of a passage or archway through the partition wall in this arch. Between the fourth and third piers was a partition wall, also of Huby's work. Of the third and second piers only the foundations remain, and the first pier has been completely destroyed, together with the north respond of this west arcade.

Of the north aisle of the hall very little can be said, owing to its ruined state. It had an ample fireplace in the middle of its length, and a partition wall crossed its east end from the buttress of the east arcade, as shewn by the cut in the plinth. The middle part with the fireplace was probably always open to the great hall.

The first or northernmost bay of the east aisle had the partition wall just mentioned on the north, and formed, with part of the second bay, a separate room. There is a cut in the base of the nook shaft of the two buttresses of the arcade that project into it, and the north buttress has its north-east corner cut down. Nearly the whole of the second bay is filled with a broad flight of stone steps, $6\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide, built during the fourteenth century to form a direct ascent from the hall to a set of chambers on the east, to be referred to presently. Eight of the steps remain, with the side walls. Between the stair and the east buttress of the north arcade, which has its south-east corner cut away for it, was a doorway into the room referred to above. Out of this there was another doorway on the south into the space under the stairs, from whence another door with a descending flight of steps led to a chamber on a lower level, which will be described in its place. The third bay was a separate room, partitioned off and entered from the hall. In its east wall is an inserted doorway and descending steps to the chamber just mentioned. Between this door and the great stair on the north is a hole twelve inches wide on the floor level, for a beam or partition. The wall of the fourth bay has been destroyed; it probably had a doorway towards the chapel, which lies east of it. The fifth bay has a fireplace of the fourteenth century in its east wall, in front of which are some large thick slabs of Huby's white limestone. The sixth bay has one jamb of a large doorway from the kitchen on the east. The seventh bay contains a large isolated fireplace of fourteenth century work, facing north; and the wall of this and the eighth bay have been taken down and rebuilt a few feet further east. There was also a partition crossing the eighth bay near its south end. Perhaps these two bays belonged to a two-storied camera, with rooms on either side of the chimney stack. The building out of the east wall may then have been for a stair to an upper story. The large fireplace block looks as if it carried another on an upper floor. The ninth bay, with part of the eighth, appears to have formed another pair of rooms;¹ there is a refuse or ash-pit outside on the east, but no opening or other feature to shew how or by whom it was used. The tenth or corner bay was evidently a room of some importance. On the east it has a fireplace with moulded jambs and sill, inserted by Huby, with a large recess or locker on the right-hand, and a doorway on the left into an ash-pit or garderobe outside. This doorway is, however, earlier than Huby's time. In the south wall is a deep and wide window recess of uncertain date. It is not improbable that both these bays had an upper story, and formed another camera. There is plenty of room for the stair in the ninth bay.

The central portion of the south aisle was most likely open to the hall. It has in the middle a wide but shallow original fireplace, which still retains part of its stone hearth and sill. In the north-east corner of the hearth is a curious oval concave hollow, probably for keeping something warm. To the east of the fireplace, against the wall, is a mass of masonry, apparently of the fourteenth century, possibly part of a large hood over the fireplace; and to the west lie two slabs of Huby's limestone.

The corner or tenth western bay formed a separate room. It has in the west wall a good plain fireplace, with stone hearth and sill, perhaps of fourteenth century work, with a recess to the south made by Huby, which seems to have had a window in it. On the north of the fireplace is a rude opening through the wall, made in Huby's time into a garderobe; this has an ash-pit on the north. The south wall of the room has in the third course from the ground three round holes, three inches in diameter. The first is thirteen inches from the west wall; from the first to the second is 4 feet 8½ inches; and from the second to the third 4 feet ½ inch. The use of these is not clear. The partition on the east side of this room ran across from the south-west corner of the buttress of the west arcade; the partition on the north crossed from the other buttress, which has all its plinth chopped down on the west side. The ninth bay formed a separate chamber, perhaps belonging to the occupant of the corner chamber; its north boundary was a partition from the pier of the arcade, which has a large beam-hole in the base at the floor level on its west side. There are several notches and holes of doubtful meaning on the north side of the west buttress which projects into this chamber. Not unlikely these two bays had an upper story, and formed a separate camera. The eighth bay formed a separate room; it has in its west wall an inserted fireplace, apparently of the fourteenth century, with a tiled hearth, to the north of which may have been a doorway. The rest of the wall, however, from here to the great entrance doorway in the second bay has been utterly destroyed; but foundations running westward from the second, third and fourth piers shew that the remainder of the aisle was also divided by partitions.¹ There is nothing to shew whether the north-west corner bay was divided off or not.

On the east side of the great hall are three other buildings: a kitchen on the south; a cellar on the north, which once had rooms over it; and a chapel in the middle, built against the south wall of the cellar. Between the chapel and the kitchen is a yard, and there are other yards or courts separating them from the great hall. The cellar was also separated from the hall by an open court subsequently made into a chamber.

This cellar, which is part of John of Kent's work, is about 58 feet long and 27 feet wide, and was vaulted in five bays with a central row of pillars. The vault was about 10 feet high, and within memory remained quite perfect, but only the groins covering the western angles are now standing; it rested on plain conical corbels against the walls and the ribs sprang directly from the pillars without any capitals. Of the easternmost pillar only its base remains; this is round, but the pillar was eight-sided. The next has completely disappeared. The other two pillars were octagonal. The east wall has been destroyed, and replaced by two arches, built probably by Mr. Aislabie. The south wall has in the easternmost bay a roughly-cut doorway and ascending steps leading to the kitchen, which is on the platform, while the cellar is on the level of the cemetery. Beside the steps on the west is a shoot into the river tunnel. Between the fourth and fifth bays is another shoot into the river, with a small square hole or shoot over it in the vault above. In the tunnel this shoot is seen to have been originally double, the eastern shoot being now blocked on the cellar side; both shoots are enclosed in the tunnel under a carefully-built segmental arch. There are no windows or other openings in the south wall, which is built against and partly forms one side of the northernmost of the great tunnels. The west wall is also blank. The first bay of the north wall had a window, the sill of which is much worn, and in front of it, on the floor, is a raised platform about 9 inches high. The second and fourth bays also had windows, but the third bay contained a large fireplace, $6\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide and nearly 3 feet deep. The fifth or westernmost bay has a segmental-headed doorway, about 6 feet high and $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide, the sill of which is 21 inches from the floor inside. It was furnished with folding-doors or shutters, secured by swinging iron bars, which have left deep grooves in the jambs. This doorway seems to have been made for bringing in stores. Subsequently it was partly built up and reduced to a window, but the filling-in has now been removed. On the outside it was at one time covered by a wooden porch. On removing the rubbish which covered the cellar floor to a depth of 2 feet, the base of a partition wall, with a doorway in the south end, was found crossing it at the first pillar. Part of the base of another partition wall was also uncovered on the line of the third pillar, against which were quantities of ashes, etc. The outside of the north wall has been stripped of its ashlar, except in the last two bays. It is possible that when the infirmary was first built this chamber served as the kitchen, and had the chapel over it.

To the south-east of the cellar, and joining to its angle, is a room of John of Kent's work, built over the northernmost river-tunnel.¹ It was 20½ feet long by 12½ feet wide, and was entered from the open space east of the chapel by a small doorway. This room is much ruined, and its north wall quite gone. Until 1887 the floor was covered with rubbish and a luxuriant crop of brambles and bushes. Immediately within, and in front of the doorway, was a drop into the river, maybe to carry off water after swilling the floor. In the north-east corner is another narrow drop into the river, probably for a garderobe; and on the east, in a part of the building now fallen, were several other garderobes, now destroyed, over a space in the tunnel between two transverse arches. In the south-east corner is the base of a doorway opening eastwards into a small lobby. This had a doorway on the south into some building, probably a garderobe, over the second tunnel, which was of the same length as the first. About 36 feet of the end of the second tunnel has, however, been destroyed, and with it the superstructure. The third tunnel stopped short in line with the west wall of the building just described; the fourth or southernmost tunnel was a few feet longer.

Between the cellar and the great hall is a space 27½ feet long and about 11 feet wide, which until it was partly cleared in 1887 had remained filled with stones and rubbish since the destruction of this part of the abbey.² It was originally an open court, not closed on the north, with a doorway and descending steps from the great hall near its north end. This was most likely the way to the garden, which seems to have been from the earliest times an appendage to a monastic infirmary. During the fourteenth century this court was roofed over and converted into a porch, by building an arch across its north end.

² It has since been completely excavated.

and a wall opposite, in which was a shouldered doorway,¹ with steps up to it; another but smaller doorway with descending steps was also made from the great hall near its south end. At a still later period a wall with a two-light window was built within the arch at the north end, and the doorway at the south end blocked up.²

During the fourteenth century, besides the alterations made in the great hall, the kitchen, chapel, and rooms above the cellar, were built, probably for the first time, or maybe in place of others of wood. The infirmary kitchen lies east of the south end of the great hall, from which it is separated by an irregularly-shaped yard. It is about 50 feet long from east to west, and has a total width of 38 feet. It is divided lengthwise by a wall about $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet thick into two parts: one formed the kitchen proper, about $22\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide; the other was a back kitchen or scullery, only 11 feet wide. The party wall has three doorways in it, one at each end, and a third in the middle; alternating with these were two huge fireplaces. In the side of the western doorway are the five lowest steps of a narrow stair in the thickness of the wall, ascending eastwards. The purpose of this, in the present ruined state of the kitchen, is difficult to see; it may have opened into the chimney for the purpose of hanging bacons to be cured by the smoke, or perchance it led to a loft above the scullery. On the east side of the eastern fireplace a large copper, projecting partly into the scullery, was inserted by Huby, who also placed another but smaller copper, the setting of which is now almost destroyed, against the middle of the east wall. Between this and the north wall, in the corner of the kitchen, is a curious stone grate in the floor. It measures about 8 feet long by 6 feet wide, and consists of two parallel series of five cross-ribs, springing from a strong central arch; there are thus formed twelve narrow openings, each about 2 feet long and 8 inches wide. The upper edges of the ribs are chamfered, to facilitate the fall of kitchen refuse into the drain below. When not in use, the grating was covered by folding doors. The grating is clearly contemporary with the kitchen, and is inserted in the roof of the river-tunnel below. Between the two middle buttresses of the east wall³ an enormous circular oven, 7 feet 4 inches in diameter, was built by Huby. Before it was built there was a doorway through the buttress on the north of it, opening on to a bridge, about 7 feet wide, over the end of the river-tunnel, from which

² In the east wall of this place are three chases, one vertical and two sloping towards the river-tunnel, in which to fix lead pipes. These communicated with the chambers over the cellar, now destroyed.

³ There are the remains of a small enclosure against the south side of the southernmost of these buttresses.

a second doorway in the corner buttress led to the court on the north of the kitchen; from the first-mentioned buttress a wall was carried eastwards along the river bank. The building of the oven blocked up the doorway at the south end of the bridge, and the other doorway being thus rendered useless, was walled up at the same time. On the north side of the kitchen were two doorways: the easternmost communicated with the cellar, probably by a pentise along a wall outside and thence across the east end of the chapel; the westernmost door opened into a broad covered passage leading in an oblique direction to the great hall. Just inside this doorway, to the west, is a narrow piece of paving, running south, with a sill along its edge. The west wall of the kitchen is nearly destroyed. It originally had towards its north end a doorway from the court on the west,¹ but this was subsequently walled up and converted into a fireplace. Behind it, in the yard, is a square enclosure. Against the middle of the west wall has been another oven, corresponding to that on the east, and beyond this is the foundation of, apparently, a buttress. The scullery retains no traces of its fittings or arrangements, except a piece of paving at the east end, with a drain against the wall running northwards. There is also some masonry of Huby's time adjoining the projection of the copper, but in so shattered a state as to make its use a mere matter of conjecture. There was no fireplace in the scullery.

Round the kitchen are the more or less ruined bases of numerous buttresses. There were three on the south, and probably originally on the north; and two on the east, and most likely two on the west; with diagonal or "french" buttresses at the corners. The projection of these buttresses seems to shew that the kitchen and scullery were each vaulted in stone. The kitchen vault must have had a central row of columns.

Between the kitchen and the chapel is an irregularly-shaped yard; it has several drops into the tunnel below for carrying off rain-water.

The infirmary chapel, which is 46 feet long and 21 feet 9 inches wide, is intermediate in date between the hall and the kitchen. Except parts of its east and west walls, it is ruined to the plinth. It still retains the altar platform, with part of its paving of stone slabs, and the base of the altar itself.² Above is also part of the north jamb of the east window, but it is doubtful if this is in place. On seem to suggest that the doorway once communicated with the great hall by a covered passage. The hall wall opposite is unfortunately destroyed.

² This is 7 feet 5 inches long and 3 feet 6 inches wide.

the north side of the altar is a narrow doorway, with a flight of steps ascending eastwards in the thickness of the wall, and west of this, against the north wall, is a broad base, nearly $11\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide and $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet projection, built of Huby's white limestone. In the north end of the west wall is the entrance doorway. It opens from an ante-chapel or lobby between the chapel and the great hall, and from holes in the walls on each side, seems to have had a wooden porch inside. The chapel must have had a wooden roof.

In the lobby, to the south of the chapel doorway, is the base of a broad flight of steps against the wall.¹ These ascended northwards to the chambers over the cellar, and were clearly made for conveying meals thither, the oblique passage from the kitchen being purposely deflected towards them. The steps were carried by an arch over the chapel doorway. Against the east wall of the chapel is a mass of masonry, which seems to indicate another and a later staircase to the rooms above the cellar. These steps partly encroach upon a passage $9\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide between the chapel and the garderobe on the east, which also allowed of direct communication between the kitchen and the cellar.

Of the chamber or chambers over the cellar nothing whatever remains, but there is no doubt of their former existence. They were reached from the great hall by a straight flight of stone steps, which opened into a lobby or ante-chamber over the space between the cellar and the hall. The staircase against the west wall of the chapel also opened into this ante-chamber, which appears to have been furnished with a lavatory and water supply.² Whether the building over the cellar comprised one, two, or more chambers, it is impossible to say. If we may suppose that the cross walls in the cellar were built to carry others above, these would indicate three chambers, two measuring each about 27 by 21 feet, the third about 27 by 12 feet. The middle chamber, which was a living-room, had on the south a pew or closet projecting into the chapel, built by Huby, and probably a fireplace in the north wall. The small room, that on the east, was perhaps a bedroom, and had a doorway in its south-west corner, through which the occupant could go to the chapel by the wall stair mentioned above, to say mass. It had probably also communication with the garderobe on the east by the staircase against the chapel wall.

From the door jambs and other wrought and moulded stonework found in the rubbish of the chamber on the west of the cellar, it is evident that these rooms were built during the fourteenth century, but altered and refitted in later times by Abbot Huby. They may have been used by the father-abbot of Clairvaux or his deputy, when he held his annual visitation in the abbey.

On the west side of the farmery hall was a passage, now greatly ruined, with a doorway at its north end from the long gallery from the cloister; the doorway is, however, a work of the fourteenth century. On the south of this passage were two rooms. The first was irregular in form, with a curious pavement of small blocks and slabs of stone, which still remains. This has an oblong portion in the centre about 8 feet long and 5 feet wide, with a broad gutter all round, from which there is a shoot in the south-east corner into the river-tunnel. There was a doorway into this chamber on the south, subsequently blocked by Abbot Huby, and a little to the west another doorway also now blocked. In the south end of the west wall is an inserted doorway from without, afterwards blocked by a slab, and converted into an opening for casting ashes through; and there was certainly one west window of two lights, and probably a second. The north wall is formed by the south side of the gallery, which has here a large block of masonry, of fourteenth century work, built against it. The use of this apartment is doubtful. Mr. Walbran says that here "stood a reservoir of water, fed from a spring above the kitchen bank, and conducted under the pavement of the hall," i.e. the misericord described below, "by a lead pipe, seamed, of course, in the old clumsy manner, and still partly visible."¹ This would point to its having been a lavatory,² and perhaps also the place of the head conduit, which was usually in the infirmary. Against the south wall is what looks like the base of a dresser built of masonry. That in later times the room was used for other purposes than a lavatory and conduit-house is proved by the miscellaneous collection of bones, broken pottery, and other objects that were found outside the partly blocked west doorway in 1849.³ The east and west walls seem to be of fourteenth century date.

The other room opening from the passage is almost completely destroyed, but a careful examination of what is left enables us to make out its later arrangements with tolerable certainty. It was a hall, 58 feet long and 22 feet wide, built over the western ends of the two northernmost river-tunnels, and therefore obliquely to the great hall on the east. About 8 feet of its eastern end was cut off by a screen to form the usual lobby, which had two doorways, one from the passage, the other in the south end. At the upper end of the hall is a dais about 8 feet wide, the step of which is of Huby's white limestone, wrought with deeply-cut quatrefoils on the front. Against the west wall, of which unfortunately only a few fragments remain, is a step, and a narrow ledge or platform about 18 inches wide, paved with small tiles. Along the north wall is the greater part of a stone bench built by Huby. The south wall is reduced to a few detached fragments only. One of these is part of a door jamb, but it is doubtful if it is in its place; it lies just below the dais. Possibly there was also a fireplace in the middle of this side, but nothing can be definitely made out. From the arrangement of this hall it is apparently the misericord, or place where flesh meat, which was forbidden in the frater, might be eaten on certain days. It had a special entrance for the monks from the long passage from the cloister, and was served either from the infirmary kitchen, or a special one on the south. The doorway at the south end of the screens is conveniently placed for bringing in dishes across the farmery hall from the kitchen on the other side, and there is some slight evidence that there was a clear passage across the hall for the purpose. There was a building corresponding to this, and in a similar part of the abbey, at Clairvaux, where it was called the refectoir gras, in contradistinction from the refectoir maigre in the cloister; and the monks ate meat there on Sundays, Tuesdays and Thursdays. On other days they dined in the frater. The misericord at Clairvaux had its special kitchen, la cuisine grasse.¹

Next to the misericord, on the south, was an apartment built over the third river-tunnel, but it has been so utterly destroyed that the only part of it left is the jamb of a doorway at the west end of its south wall, opening from another chamber beyond. This chamber, which was built over the fourth or southernmost river-tunnel, has also been almost completely destroyed, only some fragments of its south wall being left. These contain: on the east, the jamb of a doorway from a court or yard outside, with an added buttress beside it; then the sill of a single-light window and an inserted fireplace, with a broad chimney-breast behind; and beyond these, a detached buttress. About 25 feet further west is part of a high boundary (?) wall, and another wall runs westwards from the corner of the great hall to meet it. It is possible that the last-mentioned apartment was made into a kitchen when the misericord was built by Abbot Huby. The fourth river-tunnel and the destroyed room or rooms over it originally extended some distance further west than the present limit of the tunnel.

became the misericord; and at Kirkstall and Jervaulx a new kitchen, wherein meat might be cooked, was built just outside the south-east corner. A similar arrangement seems to have been made at Furness.

On the line of the south wall of the misericord, towards its west end, there are in the floor two rectangular openings, about $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet square, over the tunnel below. In the tunnel itself these are seen to be the beginning of a series, seven in number, which was covered over when the misericord wall was built. Originally the holes were open, and as they are contemporary with the tunnel, it is evident that the site of the misericord was formerly occupied by a garderobe of the same width, but probably somewhat longer towards the west. On closer examination it will be found that the outer face of its north wall, of Abbot John of Kent's work, still remains. Outside, 10 feet from the west wall of the misericord, is an opening rebated for a door, in a wall 12 inches thick, with a drop (now blocked) into the first tunnel below.

There is a drain in the middle of the misericord floor, perhaps for running off water when the pavement was swilled.

The covered passage or gallery from the cloister to the infirmary-hall consists of three parts: (1) an eastern, (2) a northern, and (3) a western. The two first were built by Abbot John of Kent, but the western part is an extension of the fourteenth century. Although the south side of the east gallery is much ruined, sufficient of it remains to shew, by comparing it also with the north side, that it was originally divided by shallow buttresses into seven bays. The first or easternmost bay contains the step and base of a doorway, 4 feet $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, to the passage of the misericord, an insertion apparently in place of an archway like that formerly in the seventh bay. The next five bays contained an arcade of nineteen trefoiled arches, carried by twin shafts, and divided into open series of three each, every fourth arch being solid behind with a shallow buttress. In the sixth bay, however, only the third arch was open. The seventh bay contained a wide arch, carried by a detached shaft on each side, and seems to have been altered. The west end of this part of the gallery was also a wide archway. The north side of this gallery is more ruined than the south, and only the lowest courses of the walls and buttresses remain. It probably had a wall arcade, divided into a series of open arches like those opposite. The easternmost bay has an inserted doorway. As this opened northward, it may have led to a staircase outside leading to the gallery overhead.

The north gallery opens out of the westernmost bay of the east gallery, and at right angles to it, and extends as far as the nine altars. It was divided by buttresses into four bays. The walls are too much ruined and altered to enable the original subdivisions to be traced, but the second bay from the church has, on the east side, the bases of a wide archway, with detached jamb shafts, that led to the cemetery.

The west gallery was not built until the fourteenth century, when it probably replaced a wooden structure that had until then connected Abbot John of Kent's infirmary with the cloister. Why the stone west gallery was not built at the same time as the others is not evident. It seems, however, to have stood on the lines of its predecessor; for while the eastern gallery is $15\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide, the width of the western one is barely 10 feet, and its walls abut against two blocks of masonry which appear to have previously received the end timbers of the wooden structure. Owing to a desire to leave a passage between the gallery and the angle of the chapter-house, the west gallery, after running straight for some 30 feet, is slightly deflected to the south for 16 feet, after which it again runs straight for the remaining 48 feet. Along both sides of the west gallery was an arcade of trefoiled arches, divided into series of three open arches with twin shafts. The deflected part of the gallery had a wide archway supported by detached shafts, and instead of three open arches on either side, had one east of it, and two on the west.

Soon after the west gallery was built, an upper story was added to the east and north galleries. To support it the open arcades were walled up or narrowed to windows, and the large archways reduced to doorways. Additional buttresses were inserted on the north and east, spaced differently from the original ones, and various substructures still remaining shew that the upper floor was a building of some pretensions. The most important of these substructures is built against the fifth bay of the east gallery, on the south side. It is still of considerable height, and contains the remains of a fireplace for warming the upper story. The sharp angles of this block shew clearly that the new superstructure was of wood only. A second block remains against the second bay, and a third, of larger dimensions and probably later date, against the sixth bay. Both these doubtless carried bay-windows, which, it will be noticed, faced south. Another block remains against the east side of the north gallery, close to the church, which Mr. Walbran describes as retaining, when first uncovered, "considerable remains of an oven with its ashes." There is nothing to shew how high it was carried up. The upper floor was probably reached by an external staircase at the north-east corner, built against the farmery hall, where there is a doorway that might have opened into it.

In the fifteenth and early part of the sixteenth centuries further considerable alterations were made in the several parts of the gallery. In the eastern division, the western bay window may be of this date. In the north gallery, the whole of the west wall, except a short length on the south, was taken down and rebuilt by Abbot Huby (1494-1526), who added a large chamber on the west side.¹ This chamber was built upon an undercroft or basement, which alone remains. It has a wide doorway and descent of four steps from the gallery, and another doorway with three steps down in the north wall. There is the sill of a narrow window high up in the south wall, and the jamb of a second. The jamb of another window remains in the north wall beside the doorway. In the north-east corner is a vice, partly built of glazed bricks, which communicated with the room over. The entrance to the room was of course from the upper story of the gallery, and this stair was for bringing up fuel or stores from the cellar below. Between this basement and the church is a doorway into the court surrounding the chapter-house.

Against the turret of the nine altars are the marks (1) of the original lead roof of the gallery before the addition of the upper story, and (2) of the later roof of the superstructure, 8 feet higher up. The window over the door of the nine altars was filled by an oriel or closet projecting into the church from the upper gallery; but only its rere-arch remains, a plain chamfered round-headed one, 12 feet high and 7 feet wide. This closet was also Huby's work. It had a flat roof over it, 30 feet from the ground.² All these features are well shown in Fig. 8.

The alterations to the west gallery were of a very extensive character. On the north side, the first seven open arches and the wider arch beyond were walled up or narrowed to windows, and a bold buttress built against the middle of the first bay. Nearly overlapping the next two bays is a broad and deep substructure, perhaps for a chimney stack. On the south the wall was entirely removed for half its length, and a new and thicker wall built further south, thus bringing the wall of the great gallery on this side into one straight line. The new wall has a buttress at about the middle of its length, and outside its east end is a square enclosure with a drain to the stream, which evidently carried a garderobe at the upper level. There seem to be the remains of a similar building on the opposite side of the gallery. At the west end of the new wall is a doorway and a wide flight of steps with two turns, that led to the upper gallery and the abbot's lodging. This staircase is for the most part older than the alterations, and apparently led to a kind of lobby built over the original eastern half of the west gallery, as well as to the abbot's lodging.

² At Rievaulx there was a two-storied gallery or series of chambers, apparently for the use of the abbot, between the farmery and the first bay of the south aisle of the presbytery, with an oriel or closet on the upper floor built out of the aisle window into the church, as at Fountains.

The narrow western section of the upper gallery was probably the library. It was about 50 feet long and 11 feet wide, and communicated with the dorter by a bridge from the room over the chapter-house. The door to this bridge is 4 feet wide, and its sill is 21 feet from the ground; it was barely 6 feet high. The farmery passage terminated westwards at a pentise built against the east wall of the dorter, which will be described in its place, immediately opposite the doorway of a passage through the dorter subvault. By means of this there was direct connection between the farmery and the cloister.

THE ABBOT'S LODGING.

The staircase to the upper floor of the farmery passage abuts against a building, partly of the first work, standing north and south. It is of several dates, and has been much altered and obscured by later additions. It is, therefore, difficult to make out its original arrangements.

It consists of two divisions: (1) a northern, at first about 25 feet from north to south, and 28 feet from east to west, with outer walls of a date anterior to the fire; and (2) a southern, formed by continuing the east and west walls of the northern division southwards for about 18 feet to the monks' rere-dorter, which extended as far eastwards as the block under notice.

The northern division originally formed part of the basement of the first rere-dorter, but was cut off by a wall as a separate section, perhaps in connection with some other building. Its south end was crossed by a wall 2 feet thick, 5 feet from and parallel with its south wall, and between them ran the drain of the old rere-dorter. This wall was afterwards removed and the drain covered over, but the junction of the wall may still be seen on the east; on the west it has been obliterated. Of other original features there remain an entrance doorway in the east end of the north wall, with a small square-headed window beside it, of uncertain date, which seems to have been built within a larger original window; and in the east wall are a blocked window and another entrance doorway, also blocked by being reduced to a window in later times. In the south wall is an inserted doorway into the southern division, and also a wide opening, now closed by later masonry; west of this is apparently another, also blocked. These are probably the lower parts of a series of arches once opening into or upon the drain.

The walls forming the southern division abut at each end with straight joints against the buildings which they connect, but they are of different thicknesses and different dates. The eastern wall, although not bonded to it, seems to be contemporary with the later rere-dorter, and was probably built to close in the court between the old and new buildings at its eastern end. It contains an entrance doorway from without, now blocked, and the sill of a narrow window, of course of later date. The western wall is of the fourteenth century, and formed part of certain extensive alterations that were then made in the block.

There is nothing to shew for what purpose the older part of the block just described was built, but it is possible that it may have served as the rere-dorter of the first infirmary, which there are reasons for supposing stood a little to the east of the present chapter-house. It so continued until Abbot John of Kent built the stone infirmary, and thus was allowed to remain when the rest of the structure of which it formed part was pulled down after the building of the new rere-dorter. On the completion of the new infirmary, it seems to have been connected with it in some way by a passage or gallery running eastwards from the north-east corner.

In the earlier part of the fourteenth century, extensive alterations, as has been shewn, were made to the block, and it was then converted into a camera or set of chambers for the abbot. According to the Consuetudines, the abbot was "in dormitorio jacere, in hospitio comedere," but he must soon have obtained for himself a separate chamber under the dorter roof, and in course of time he moved out of it altogether. His new lodging seems, however, always to have remained in communication with the dorter, even though separated from it by the length of the rere-dorter, to which it was usually attached. As this was technically part of the dorter, the abbot was thus enabled to comply with the direction of the Consuetudines, and possibly in some cases he continued to sleep in the dorter itself. This he could easily do, since his camera, the rere-dorter, and the dorter, were all on the same level.

The acquisition of a separate camera is perhaps foreshadowed by an existing building at Kirkstall, where what is practically a fairly complete example of a three-storied late twelfth century house extends eastwards from the end of the monks' rere-dorter, and probably served, at any rate in later times, as the abbot's camera. There also remains at Jervaulx a two-storied thirteenth century house, extending southwards from the east end of the monks' rere-dorter, which is in the same position as the first rere-dorter at Fountains.¹

et posicione lapidum politorum ad opus ejusdem. c. li. sterling." In 1335 "construere cepit Dompnus Ricardus de Schepish. Abbas xii^{us} de Crokesdeno novam cameram suam inter coquinam Infirmitorii et Dormitorium. Et anno

The fourteenth century alterations by which the building in question was converted into the abbot's lodging included (1) the erection of the western wall already noticed, (2) the subdivision of the new southern chamber thus formed, as well as the old northern chamber by cross walls, and (3) the addition, on the north, of a staircase to the basement in connection with the stair there by which the first floor was reached from the gallery. Various alterations were also made in the basement as regards the doors and windows, and new openings formed. Thus in the south chamber the archway in its north wall was closed with masonry, in which two lockers were formed; a window was also pierced in its east wall, and the doorway there filled up and the base of a chimney breast built against its outside. A doorway was also cut through the wall between the north and south chambers, and the other old opening in it reduced to a doorway. The alterations in the walls of the north chamber have already been described.

The subdivision of the older chambers was effected by cutting off the western part of each by a wall running north to south; the two walls, however, are not quite in line. The walled-off portion of the northern chamber was further subdivided to form two cells, with narrow doorways connecting them and the larger cell to the south. These cells were used as prisons, and each retains an iron staple, to which a prisoner might be chained. In the large cell this is in the east wall, near the floor; in the middle cell, in its north wall; in the end cell, in a stone in the floor. The two small cells have each a garderobe in the floor in the south-west corner, which opened into a drain there in connection with the old drain of the first rere-dorter. In the large cell are traces of ijc and a black-letter inscription in the plastering of the east wall.

sequente magnis sumptibus perfecit eam." Cott. MS. Faustina B. 6, ff. 75*b* and 90.

At Meaux there is no mention of the abbot's lodging until the beginning of the fourteenth century, when Abbot Roger of Driffield (1286-1310), intending to resign "ædificavit pro receptaculo suimet post abbatiam quandam cameram, quæ post illud tempus dicitur et est camera abbatis; uti cernitur in presenti ab orientali parte infirmatorii monachorum." (Chronica de Melsa, ii. 238.) It is also recorded that on the deposition of Abbot William of Dringhoe (1349-53) there was granted for his use "unam cameram quam dominus Hugo de Levena (abbot 1339-49) fecerat pro cessione sua preparari, inter infirmatorium et dormitorium monachorum." (Ibid. iii. 86.) Abbot Hugh, however, died of the great pestilence.

It will be noticed that in at least two of these cases the camera was built near the dorter, so as to comply as far as possible with the direction in the Consuetudines.

At Rievaulx, at the time of the Suppression, the abbot's house seems to have been between the infirmary and the church. At Hayles it was apparently on the site of the cellarium, for among the "Houses and buyldyngs assigned to remayne undefaced" was "The late abbott's lodging extending from the church to the frayter southward with payntre buttre kitchen larder sellers and the lodgings over the same." P. R. O. Augmentation Office Book 494, f. 67.

How far the upper story, which formed the abbot's lodging proper, was affected by these changes, or in what way they were extended to it, can only be surmised, since nothing of it is left.¹

Lastly, during the abbacy of Marmaduke Huby (1494-1526) the abbot's lodging was enlarged to nearly double its former length. The evidence of this consists of (1) a thick wall, with a circular stair at its north end, built across the rere-dorter subvault in continuation of the west wall of the block under notice, and (2) two masses of masonry added outside the east and south walls, as substructures for new upper works.

The vice added at the north end of the block is contemporary with and attached to the staircase to the upper floor of the farmery passage. This staircase also opened into the abbot's lodging, but was partly rebuilt by Abbot Huby. The vice, which is curiously corbelled out at its base, so as not to obscure the window that adjoins it,² led down from the abbot's apartments to the basement, which probably formed the cellars or servants' department. This basement, as already noticed, has an outer door on the north, to which a flight of steps leads down from the yard on the south side of the farmery passage. The thick wall added at the south end has a way through its north end, with east and west doorways, which also formed a lobby at the base of another circular stair leading down from the abbot's apartments. The thickness of the wall, 6 feet, suggests that it also supported a fireplace in the chamber above. The substructures on the south and east sides of the block evidently carried respectively two large oriel or bay windows and a chimney. Now that the whole of the abbot's lodging has been pulled down, there is some uncertainty as to its subdivisions.

label, were the arms of Geoffrey le Scrope, afterwards Lord of Masham, second son of Sir William Scrope, of Bolton. In 1318 he enfeoffed the abbey with a house in York, and died in 1340. The five abbots referred to by Roger the cellarer would be Robert of Burley, then abbot, William Gower (1369-1383), Robert Monkton (1346-1369), Robert Copgrove (1336-1345-6), and Walter of Coxwold (1316-1336), in whose days the above-mentioned grant was made. If the abbot's camera was built by Abbot Walter, he may well have adorned the windows with the arms of benefactors, including those of his new neighbour, the Lord of Masham, who not improbably contributed to the building.

If the prison walls did not carry anything, the whole of the older portion of the block may have formed the basement of the abbot's hall. This would have been about 48 feet long (inclusive of the screens at its north end) and 28 feet wide. Beyond it was the solar, a fine room, measuring 28 feet by 18 feet, with a wide bay window at the east end, and on the west a large fireplace and doorway to the circular stair beside it. Further south, and built over the drain of the rere-dorter, would be the abbot's bedroom, with a wide bay window on the south, and probably containing a little oratory on the east and a garderobe on the west. It is, however, possible, that instead of the hall, there were two lesser chambers, corresponding to those below, with a lobby or corridor on the west of each, formed by erecting stud partitions on the line of the prison walls beneath. This would give accommodation for the servants; and as there was clearly a passage or gallery from the north-east corner of the abbot's lodging to the dais end of the misericord, it is possible that the latter served as the abbot's hall also. The absence of all signs of a kitchen attached to the abbot's lodging, renders this arrangement even probable. Further, the misericord, as already stated, was the work of Abbot Huby, who also carried out the whole of the later works of the abbot's lodging and of the galleries connecting the infirmary with the church and cloister. If the several chambers thus erected by Huby together formed a somewhat straggling abbot's lodging, they doubtless answered the purposes for which he had contrived them as well as an entirely new block of buildings would have done.

Besides the chambers described, the abbot probably had the use, as a gallery or walking-place, of the greater part of the upper story of the farmery passage; and from the oriel or pew at the end of the north gallery he could hear mass in the nine altars. This additional accommodation would also the better enable him to entertain guests.

THE CLOISTER.

The cloister at Fountains is placed on the south side of the nave. It is, roughly, 125 feet square, and was surrounded by covered alleys about 11 feet wide. One interesting fact about it is that it was originally planned of the same large size; the north and west walls, much of the east side, and a fragment on the south, being parts of the monastery built before the fire of 1147.¹

Since the monks lived in the cloister, all the buildings connected with their daily life are placed round it, and accessible from it. These buildings are enumerated in their proper order in the directions in the Consuetudines for the Sunday procession, as follows: capitulum or chapter-house, auditorium or parlour, dormitorium or dorter, dormitorii necessaria or rere-dorter, calefactorium or warming house, refectorium or frater, coquina or kitchen, cellarium or cellarer's building. These will be considered in their turns.

Whether the wall towards the garth was originally of stone or wood is unknown. Whatever had escaped or been built after the fire of 1147 was cleared away by Abbot John of Kent (1220-47), one of whose great works was a new cloister. None of this now remains in place, but in the abbey museum are some interesting bases from the angles, etc. and other details that almost certainly belonged to it. From these we find it was of the usual character of the period, an open arcade, supported at regular intervals on twin shafts.¹

The east, south, and west alleys of the cloister were chiefly passages, with doors opening out of them into the various offices already enumerated. The north alley was practically the living room of the monks, where they sat and read when not engaged in the church or elsewhere. Its north wall is the south wall of the church, and is divided into seven and a half bays by pilaster buttresses rising from a plinth like that on the north side of the nave; but the curious intermediate rudimentary pilasters have in every case been cut away, except on the extreme west, where a part of one is left. The easternmost bay contains a broad projection, in which is the door to the church, a plainly-moulded round-headed one with engaged jamb shafts having scalloped capitals. There is now a flight of seven steps up to the church floor, but these are not original, though they represent the old steps. The second bay is flush with the pilasters, and has in the eastern half a large blocked recess, flanked by two other very narrow recesses, also blocked.² The rest of the bays are quite plain. Along the whole of this wall was a bench, the height and extent of which are clearly shewn by the whitewash. It will be noticed that the second or western door from the cloister to the church, which is generally found in the cloisters of the Benedictine and other Orders, is here wanting. This is a Cistercian peculiarity, due probably to the fact that the Sunday procession passed through the cellarium instead of returning along the west alley of the cloister.

² At Beaulieu, in the north alley of the cloister, there are seven large and deep pointed recesses in the church wall, perhaps to hold the library.

About one-fourth of the east side of the cloister is overlapped by two bays of the south transept. The first bay is plain on the cloister side, but the second contains a wide shallow round-headed recess. This is the place of the armarium commune or common bookcase, wherein were kept books for use in the cloister.¹ The pilaster buttress immediately to the south has a chase or sinking in its face, 3 feet high and about 2 feet wide, maybe for a sculptured tablet, and in the plinth below it, to the left, is a cut 11 inches wide. The bay next the transept contains a wide but plain round-headed arch of the first work, opening into a long and irregular passage from the cloister towards the cemetery. The history of this passage presents several difficulties which can only be cleared up by a careful examination of the masonry. The arch of entrance and the whole of the north side are before the fire of 1147; but the east arch and all the south side belong to the rebuilding. The vault, of course, is of the later date, and two of the vaulting shafts on the north side are insertions for it. The north wall has first a plain length with a plinth, then a broad projection for the great stair in the transept wall; next to this is a door and descending steps from the church. Just to the east of the door the wall is rough, as if something had been cut away; beyond this is a broad pilaster, and then the external plinth of the transept chapel. Digging in front of the rough piece of wall brought to light in 1887 a foundation, 3 feet wide, crossing the passage; and it then became evident that the passage was originally only 33 feet long, the remainder being open to the air. Possibly it was wider in its first state.

There are no signs of the first arrangements, except two notches in the plinth on the left of the entrance from the cloister, and these do not tell anything. The east end has now a tall, pointed arch, but originally there was here a segmental-headed doorway with a pointed window-opening above. In the south wall, towards the west, is a plain segmental-headed archway into the chapter-house, now blocked.² The vault of this passage is peculiar. It consists of (1), on the west, a broad half-wagon rubble vault without ribs, over which passes the stair from the transept to the dorter; (2) a broad bay at the stair-projection, with transverse and diagonal ribs; and (3), to the east, four smaller bays, with ribs like (2). The transverse ribs are merely chamfered on the edges, while the diagonals have a bold roll on the flat soffit; there are no wall ribs.

¹ A similar recess remains at Kirkstall and Waverley, and also at Rievaulx, but there the back has been knocked out, and it is often mistaken for a doorway. There are two lockers in

² This was blocked early, for on the chapter-house side the string-course is carried right across. There are traces of similar openings at Furness and Jervaulx.

In many Cistercian abbeys, e.g. Beaulieu, Jervaulx, Netley, Kirkstall, Tintern, Croxden, and Roche, the room between the chapter-house and transept formed the vestry. Its west end was cut off by a wall and formed into a closet entered from the cloister, as at Kirkstall and Tintern, and sometimes raised above its level, as at Beaulieu and Roche. This closet formed the library, and at Meaux we know not only what books it contained, but how they were arranged.¹ Possibly the vestry and book closet at Fountains were here at first, but both were afterwards moved elsewhere, and the space turned into a passage. In comparatively recent times the place seems to have been used as a charnel-house or bone-hole.²

THE CHAPTER-HOUSE.

Next to the passage is the capitulum or chapter-house, so called because a portion of the rule of St. Benedict was read in it daily after terce. This was a noble room, about 84 feet long and 41 feet wide, of six bays, divided by two rows of pillars into three alleys. It was entered from the cloister by three large round-headed arches, each with five orders towards the cloister and two towards the chapter-house. The order forming the soffit was carried by triple jamb shafts, the others by detached single shafts, all of stone. The capitals have square abaci. The chapter-house was lighted by eight large round-headed windows: two on the north, three on the east, and three more on the south, with detached jamb shafts within and without. The openings were filled with wooden frames carrying the glass, and fixed by iron pins. The vaulting is destroyed. The ten pillars that supported it had plain circular shafts, 12½ inches in diameter, but of these only the four easternmost bases and the plinths of the next two pairs remain. The capitals,³ shafts, and bases were all of marble. Round the walls the vault rested on three-sided corbels carved with leafwork, volutes, or other ornament. The

² Mr. Walbran thus describes its condition at the excavations of 1854: "The doorways at each end have long been walled up, so as to form the place into a gloomy apartment, formerly filled with tesserae and paving tiles. In the course of the excavation, however, it became necessary to take down the wall which separated it from the cloister court; and then, under rubbish that had fallen from the vaulted roof above, was discovered a mass of human bones, sufficient, according to a careful computation, to have formed not less than four hundred skeletons. . . . They were removed, on the day when they were found, to a grave prepared for them, at the west end of the nave." Memorials of Fountains, ii. part i. 154.

vaulting of the four eastern bays was 2 feet 10 inches higher than the western portion, which was kept lower on account of the dorter above it. Owing to the change of level, a small shaft has been inserted on each side on the line of junction to carry the diagonal rib of the higher part, and the corbels beyond are also raised. Against the east wall, except in the centre, and extending along the side walls as far as the middle of the fifth bay, are three stone benches, each 10½ inches high, rising one above another, but the covering slabs have gone. On these benches the monks sat when assembled in chapter. The abbot or president had a separate seat against the middle of the east wall. Immediately in front of this, and extending down the middle of the house, are the more or less perfect gravestones of thirteen abbots, of whom nineteen are recorded to have been buried here. The most prominent and best-preserved is that of John of Kent, who died in 1247, a ridged coffin-lid of grey marble, with an inscription down each side. Among other memorials that can be identified are those of William of Allerton, the twelfth abbot, of Adam his successor, and of Reginald, the fifteenth abbot.¹ In the middle of the second central bay is a stone with a socket for the analogium or desk. The last bay of the north alley has been cut off from the rest of the house by solid walls, quite regardless of a grave-slab on the south, and the corresponding bay of the south alley seems to have been similarly treated. The apartments thus formed were perhaps for additional library books.² The floor of the chapter-house was paved with tiles, 3 to 3½ inches square.

The exterior of the chapter-house has been stripped of most of its ashlar facing on the north and east above the basement-course; that below it escaped through the lower part of the wall being buried in rubbish until the excavations of 1854. The south side is fairly perfect (Fig. 13). The basement-course consists, first, of a narrow chamfered plinth, with a broader one above, then a band of ashlar with a bold half-roll stringcourse over, then three more courses of ashlar with a three-sided stringcourse, above which are the windows. These have or had jamb shafts carrying the outer order of the window head, which consisted of a bold roll with a three-sided hoodmold returned as a stringcourse between the windows and round the pilaster buttresses. Below this stringcourse are nine courses of ashlar, and above it nine more. Then comes another stringcourse, above which are the dorter windows. These are smaller versions of those below, but the hood-molds are not returned. Below a square-headed window on the south side, cut through the pilaster buttress between the second and third dorter windows, are two deep cuts, as if a wooden platform had been fixed there; but the object of this is not evident. Was it for pigeons to alight on? All the work of the chapter-house is immediately subsequent to the fire of 1147, except the vault and the pillars that supported it. These are of the same date as the frater, and were therefore inserted some time after the springers. There is evidence that a slight change was then made in the section of the vaulting ribs in the south alley, which were designed to be different from those in the north and middle alleys. It will be noticed that no marble is used in the construction of the chapter-house, but by the time the vault was built it had come into fashion. There is nothing to indicate the size and extent of the first chapter-house. It was probably somewhat narrower and only two-thirds as long as its successor. Part of its south wall remains in the parlour, from being there common to both.

THE PARLOUR.

Adjoining the chapter-house on the south is the auditorium juxta capitulum or parlour. Here such talking as was necessary might be carried on instead of in the cloister, where silence was strictly enjoined. The parlour is a handsome room, $27\frac{1}{2}$ feet long and $10\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide, entered from the cloister by a fine round-headed arch, identical in almost every way with the chapter-house arches. At the opposite end is a doorway, also round-headed, which had folding doors; it is externally of three orders, with jamb shafts, and has the masonry scored with red lines. The vaulting, which is pointed, is perfect, of three bays, with cross and diagonal ribs resting on elaborate but peculiar corbels at the sides. The north wall of the parlour seems to be prior to the fire of 1147, with insertions made in the rebuilding. The east and south walls are of the newer work, except perhaps a fragment at the west end of the latter. It is probable, therefore, that in the first buildings the parlour occupied this same position.

THE DORTER.¹

In the cloister, immediately to the south of the parlour door, is part of the wall of the first work, with the jamb of a lofty doorway. This formed the entrance to the day-stairs to the monks' dorter, commonly found in this position in early times, as at Kirkstall and elsewhere. In derived from the Old French dortour or dortoir, which in turn comes from the Latin dormitorium. See A New English Dictionary, iii. 607, s.v. Dortour, Dorter.

the alterations after the fire, the stairs were removed to another place and the doorway blocked up; it was also partly destroyed by the insertion of a new doorway a little further south. This doorway is of two orders, with jamb shafts, and has some remains of painted decoration in red, blue, etc. It opens into a room 103 feet long and 28 feet wide, extending under the south part of the dormer. Down the middle is a row of six round pillars, originally $6\frac{1}{2}$ feet high, and at the north end a half-octagon respond.¹ The northernmost bay was shut off from the rest by a wall on the line of the first pier, and formed the usual passage from the cloister to the farmery. The vault is all gone; it had plain chamfered ribs, springing at the sides from plain three-sided corbels. The vault and its supports, as well as the north wall and south end, are later than the fire, but the side walls for the most part belong to the first building. Originally it was not vaulted, but had a flat wooden ceiling, about 7 feet from the present floor level. At the north end of the east wall is a segmental-headed doorway from without, with a small blocked window beside it. This opened into the space beneath the original dormer day-stairs, which were enclosed by a wall crossing the present room about 12 feet from the end. South of the day-stairs another cross-wall formed a narrow passage from the cloister towards the infirmary. The small round-headed doorways at each end of this remain, though now blocked. About the middle of the west wall is a square-headed doorway from without,² with a small window over it, inserted after the fire. Opposite is an opening, once of the same character, but it has been much altered, and now forms simply an arched opening in the wall. These two doorways belonged to a passage leading to an open court or yard on the east. About 9 feet to the south there is in the west wall a tall round-headed window, of a date later than the fire, now blocked up outside, and opposite is another window, but not so tall, also blocked.³ Six feet further south of each of these windows is a straight joint in the wall. This is the jamb of a wide arch or opening on each side of the main block. In the repairs that must have been undertaken immediately after the fire to make the dormer temporarily habitable, the south end was rebuilt, and then these openings were walled up and reduced to doorways 4 feet wide. The western doorway was subsequently blocked. Immediately to the south of these doorways was apparently a wooden screen or partition, as may be seen from the holes

¹ The bases of the first and second pillars are two inverted square cushioned capitals, which if not set up by way of "restoration," by Mr. Aislabic, must be a re-use of old material in the re-building after the fire. The remaining bases closely resemble those in the western guest-house. The capitals were very plain.

² This now gives access into a series of dark vaulted spaces beneath the day-stairs that were built after the fire.

³ The western window was blocked when the warming-house and its adjuncts were built.

for the beam ends just above the floor. In the end of the east wall is a blocked opening or doorway, and along the south end is a stone bench table. The only windows in this building as altered after the fire were two at the south end and one in the east wall, and it is therefore difficult to suggest to what use it was put.

The late Mr. Edmund Sharpe, in his Architecture of the Cistercians,¹ through a misconception of the meaning of the word, has called it the "fratry," and says it was "the ordinary day-room" or "living room of the monks." And others following him have continued to call it by these names. But the monks' frater was their dining-hall, and their day-room or living room was the cloister alley next the church, where they spent all their time when not specially employed elsewhere. The building under notice must therefore have had some other use.

Although the basement now forms a single apartment, it is evident that before the fire it had several subdivisions. Thus in the north end was (1) the day-stair to the dorter; then came (2) the passage to the farmery, etc. out of which probably opened (3) a chamber of about four bays, with windows in its south part only, and a second passage through the block. Beyond this was (4) a square chamber, probably with arched openings on its east, west, and south sides. As none of these divisions exceeded 7 feet in height, the chambers could only have served as store-places for tools, etc.²

In the reconstruction following the fire, the old dorter stair and the various subdivisions were cleared away. The new passage through the first bay was then walled off from the remainder, which seems to have formed one long apartment, lighted only by the two south windows. It can hardly, therefore, have served as a living room, though part of it may have been used by the novices, and it most likely continued, as before, to be used for a store and as the place where the tools were kept that were given out to the monks when they went forth daily to their allotted share of manual labour, ¹ (London, 1874), p. 18. Mr. Walbran also calls it "the frater-house" (Memorials of Fountains, ii. pt. i. 141).

² From the architectural pretensions of some dorter subvaults it is clear that they must have had other uses than as mere store-places, though it is not easy to say what those uses were. At Furness, where the subvault is of late twelfth century work, it was twelve bays long, and the two southernmost bays were open on three sides, the dorter wall above being carried on piers and arches. A like arrangement probably existed at Fountains. At Jervaulx, where the subvault is of the thirteenth century, and six bays long, the south wall was pierced by two wide arches with a dividing pier, beyond which was added in the fourteenth century a lobby with a small chapel east of it. The reason for these open-ended subvaults is not now apparent, but it must soon have passed away, since at Furness the openings were all walled up early in the thirteenth century, and in one of them was built a large fireplace. The dorter subvault at Netley and that at Neath, both of the thirteenth century, have original fireplaces in them, and have evidently been important rooms. At Jervaulx the eastern alley was in later times cut up into a number of small chambers, each provided with a fireplace; the western alley was kept open as a passage or corridor. There are no marks of subdivisions at Furness, and it is difficult to suggest for it any other use than a passage, which seems unlikely. Perhaps it formed there and elsewhere the novices' department.

Above this basement was the southern part of the first dorter, of which there are some interesting remains, extending also over the parlour. On the west side some 15 feet of wall is left, but without openings of any kind; the rest is utterly ruined. The south end is also gone, but a good deal of the east side remains as far as the chapter-house. It has towards the north two round-headed windows; then a lamp niche going through the wall, so that the light shewed both ways; and beyond this a doorway. Further south are the remains of two more of the windows.¹ These windows are all of small size, barely 4 feet high and 1 foot wide, and have their heads each cut out of a single stone, as have all the small windows of the first work in the monastic buildings. The height of the old dorter from floor to wall plate was about 12 feet. The northern half of it was removed during the rebuilding after the fire of 1147; the southern part escaped, through the walls being raised and incorporated in the new work.

Before describing the dorter as rebuilt, and other chambers on the first floor, it will be convenient to notice some further remains of the earlier works on the east.

On the east side of the basement of the old dorter, and about the middle of its length, is the lower part of a wall running eastwards for 60 feet, where it joins the abbot's camera. Five feet to the north of this wall there exists, underground, the base of a second wall, 2 feet thick, running parallel with it; and 17½ feet further north is the foundation of a third wall, also running east to the abbot's camera, where its junction may still be seen. Between the first and second walls was a drain, which ran eastwards, through a half-arch still visible, under the building there. The first and third walls were carried up as high as those of the old dorter, but the second or thin wall did not extend higher than the dorter floor. It is evident, therefore, that we have here the remains of the first dormitorii necessaria or rere-dorter.² It was connected with the old dorter by a doorway still remaining (see above), and the lamp niche beside the latter opened two ways, to serve the double purpose of lighting both chambers. The room on the ground floor was perhaps a store-house or workshop. Against its north wall was probably a pentise, continuing the passage through the dorter basement from the cloister, and forming the way to the first infirmary. The doorways into the cellar beneath the rere-dorter must have opened from this passage. In the rebuilding after the fire, the westernmost two-thirds of the old rere-dorter was pulled down, and a new rere-dorter of larger size built further south; the south wall, however, was left, though perhaps not to the full height throughout its length. From a slight difference in date between the dorter as rebuilt and the new rere-dorter it is probable that the old rere-dorter was temporarily repaired after the fire and continued in use while the new one was building.

It has already been pointed out that against the west wall of the south transept was a flight of steps to the chambers over the eastern range.¹ These steps led through an arch (not a doorway) in the transept wall into a sort of lobby over the vaulted passage below. This lobby has low down in its west wall a wide round-headed recess,² 8½ inches deep, over which was probably a window, but the wall here, as well as on the south, has gone. At the east end is an arch, about 8 feet wide, which has been built up, and a segmental-headed door inserted. This opens into a small chamber, now much ruined, having a good round-headed recess in the south wall, 3 feet 4½ inches high, 3 feet 4 inches wide, and 1 foot 5 inches deep, and in the opposite wall the marks of a cupboard or set of shelves. There was an eastern window; and the roof was a steep wooden lean-to against the transept.³ This chamber, like the corresponding apartment at Netley, Kirkstall, and elsewhere, was most likely the treasury; at Meaux the precious ornaments and relics were kept by the sacrist in camera infra dormitorium, probably corresponding to this at Fountains.⁴

Entered by a door from the lobby, and extending over the chapter-house, parlour, and the vaulted basement to the south, was the great dormitorium or dorter of the monks, 165 feet in length. The floor of the part over the easternmost two-thirds of the chapter-house was 2 feet 10 inches above the rest, but there are no signs of any screen or partition of any kind.⁵ This raised portion was lighted by four windows on each side and three on the east; but those on the east and north are much ruined. On the south a small square-headed doorway has been inserted between the first window and the east wall; the second window has had its east jamb cut back, and between it

³ This was kept low on the south so as not to block the windows of the room over the chapter-house.

and the third window a small square-headed window has been made. The fourth window has gone. The angle where the wall here returns to the south has a bold roll moulding. Just round the corner a small square-headed window has been made, looking south-east, and next to this is another, 15 inches wide, facing east. Then comes a plain round-headed arch, $7\frac{3}{4}$ feet high and $4\frac{3}{4}$ feet wide, apparently on a lower level than the floor; it is now blocked, but shews outside in the same way. It may have been for bringing materials through while the dorter was in building, but it is also not unlikely that it opened into an external wooden gallery which formed a temporary passage from the rebuilt dorter to the old rere-dorter during the construction of the new one. After the latter came into use it was walled up. Beyond this is another small square-headed window, and beside it one of the large dorter windows. The rest of the wall is much ruined, but there seem to have been three other large windows in the part left, with square-headed loops between them. The south end of the dorter is quite gone. The northern half only of the west wall is left to a height of some three or four courses; it contains recesses for seven or eight windows, not equally spaced, which were probably alternately loops, as in the east wall. The northernmost recess is paved with green glazed tiles.

Owing to the ruined state of the dorter, it is impossible to speak with certainty as to its arrangements. There are some holes between the east windows suggestive of the partitions of the cubicles, each cubicle having a window. The intermediate loops perhaps lighted alternate cubicles. In the great vice in the transept gable are two openings into the roof of the dorter (see Fig. 13). The first, at the ceiling line, is 2 feet $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, and 4 feet 9 inches high; it was not fitted with a door. The second is at a higher level, and had a door; it is only 21 inches wide, but 5 feet 7 inches high. At the south end of the dorter, in the east wall, would be an entrance into the rere-dorter.

In the earliest Cistercian abbeys the dorter was ordinarily reached by a flight of steps in the middle of its length from the east alley of the cloister, as at Kirkstall and Cleeve, and as I have shewn, originally at Fountains also. The stairs are usually found in the later foundations in the corner of the cloister, and parallel with the dorter, as at Tintern, Beaulieu, Furness, Whalley, Salley, Bindon, and Buildwas, and after the fire of 1147, they were built in the same position at Fountains. We thus get two stairs to the dorter: the one from the cloister, for ordinary use during the day; the other leading down into the transept, by which the monks went to the vigiliæ or night offices in the church.

The day-stair at Fountains commences at the extreme end of the south side of the cloister, into which it projects somewhat, and passes up under a plain semi-circular archway of the work after the fire. The arch has at some time been partly closed or narrowed to a door, as may be seen from the holes and cuts for it. On the west wall, as one ascends the stair, are nine holes for pins or other fastenings for a handrail, $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet above the steps. The stair itself was lighted by a transomed window over the arch of entrance, above the cloister roof, and the passage was vaulted in four bays. This vault and the wall below it are of later date than the stairs, and belong to the work of the warming-house. Over the northern end of the passage, and extending about 15 feet, was a loft or store-place, probably entered from the dorter. It was subsequently removed, for two of the eight joist holes for its floor still remain blocked. There are holes for fixing pins or other fastenings on the line of the first and second corbels on which the passage-vault rested.¹ At the head of the stairs, where the vault abutted against a transverse arch, were probably three doorways opening from a vaulted lobby: (1) one on the left, into the dorter; (2) a second on the right, leading to the chambers above the calefactorium; and (3) a third in front, opening into a room that extended southwards as far as the end of the dorter. Owing to the whole of the west side of the dorter being broken down, there is nothing to shew that the first doorway existed, and it is quite possible that the northern part of the room entered by the third doorway formed a lobby to the dorter. Excepting the base of its doorway, this room has utterly disappeared, and its extent can only be fixed by the fortunate existence of the lower courses of the walls of its basement. These show that it had a garderobe in the south-east corner.² It was perhaps the bedroom of the abbot, who was enjoined by the statutes in dormitorio jacere.

THE RERE-DORTER.

The rere-dorter built after the fire was 92 feet long. Its south wall³ was an extension eastwards of the south wall of the new dorter, and the whole building extended as far east as the old rere-dorter did. The new building was divided lengthwise by a thick wall, parallel with and $5\frac{1}{2}$ feet distant from the south wall, leaving on the north a long room or basement, about projecting corbels that carried a garderobe in the south-west corner of the dorter.

³ A short length of this on the west belongs to the work before the fire.

18 feet wide. This has a doorway into it from the dorter basement on the west, and in its north wall a fireplace,¹ an entrance doorway from the yard or court outside, and a widely splayed window. The basement was vaulted in five bays.² A partition at one time cut off 24 feet of its western end, and the two eastern bays were shut off by a thick wall and other alterations effected by Abbot Huby, as already described in the account of the abbot's lodging. The narrow division along the south side formed the drain of the rere-dorter. In the western end of the outer wall is an oblique arch through it; this is part of the work before the fire, and was perhaps the way through which water from the river was conveyed to the old rere-dorter, but afterwards utilized in the new building, though the old drain seems to have been kept. Beyond this, eastwards, is a short length of solid wall, and then a series of four wide arches. These are carried on piers, ingeniously planned to offer the least resistance to the admission of the stream, which then ran right up to the wall, and continually flushed the drain.³ The east end of the drain is spanned by a wide and lofty arch. Just within this, on the north side, is an arch in the side of the drain, and in the east wall of the basement, low down, is another, as if water was allowed to pass obliquely across the end of it. Whatever the arrangement was, at an early date it was done away, and the arches filled up solid with ashlar; the easternmost of the south arches was also walled up at the same time. Maybe some weakness had been produced by a flood or the constant rush of water. The thrust of the arch spanned by the end of the drain is met by a buttress, with a diagonal slope on the west to throw off the water. All the upper part of the rere-dorter has long been destroyed.⁴

After the building of the new rere-dorter, its predecessor was for the most part taken down, with the exception of its south wall, and a courtyard formed on the site. Along the dorter wall was then built a pentise. It extended from the chapter-house southwards for about 62 feet to the south wall of the old rere-dorter, and was about 10 feet in width. It was carried in front by a low wall, which was bonded

² The plan of the abbey in Burton's Monasticon Eboracense, published in 1758, shews two pillars in this basement, but they cannot have belonged to the vault.

⁴ The great rere-dorter at Rievaulx occupies the same position as at Fountains. Its ground floor consisted of a large hall with the drain along the south side. The first floor was divided up by wooden partitions and had two doorways close together between it and the dorter, one for entrance, the other for exit. Towards the east end the rere-dorter was in later times curtailed and the building divided into a series of chambers three stories high, connected with the infirmary. At Kirkstall and Valle Crucis the rere-dorter is attached to the south end of the dorter.

into the chapter-house buttress, and had a flat ceiling carried by a row of corbels in the dorter wall, and covered by a steep lean-to roof, also carried by corbels. Under the pentise the wall was whitened and marked out with red lines. The pentise evidently formed part of the works of the extensive rebuildings necessitated by the fire of 1147, since the stringcourse round the chapter-house windows and buttresses is stopped off for it at the buttress where the pentise begins. The pentise itself has of course long been destroyed, but the marks of it on the walls are very plain. Out of it opened the passage to the farmery, as described above.

The area between the old and new rere-dorters formed another yard or court. At one time there existed a chamber or building in its west end, on account of which the dorter subvault window there was blocked up, as well as that in the new rere-dorter basement. Its date, extent, and use are however unknown.

The present site of the dorter day-stairs was occupied before the fire by a passage, about 30 feet long, leading from the cloister southwards. The works of the rebuilding have obliterated nearly every trace of it, but its south end with the doorway has been preserved under the dorter stairs.¹ The passage was probably vaulted, like that in the corresponding position at Kirkstall. South of it was an open court or yard, with archways into the dorter basement, as has been already noted.

At the foot of the day-stair, immediately to the west, is a buttress with chamfered edges. This has, about $8\frac{1}{2}$ feet from the ground, two pin holes, 6 inches apart, for fixing a sconce or cresset. Next to the buttress is a deep round-headed recess, 21 inches from the ground. It has no marks of shelves or other fixtures, but has at some time been clumsily fitted with a door. Its use is uncertain. Perhaps it was a towel closet. To the west of it is another buttress, beyond which is a very plain round-headed doorway into the calefactorium or warming-house.

THE WARMING-HOUSE.

The calefactorium was the place provided with a fire whereat the monks who were in cloister might come and warm themselves in winter. It is a lofty and spacious room, $38\frac{1}{2}$ feet long and $22\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide, with a stone vault supported by a central pillar. On the east wall are two enormous fireplaces, each 16 feet 3 inches wide and $5\frac{1}{2}$ feet deep, with lintels each formed of twenty-one stones joggled together. The northern fireplace has been walled up, and its chimney taken down; probably because in later days, when the number of monks had diminished, and the comfortable infirmary was more frequented, one fireplace was found to be sufficient. In the west wall, opposite, are two pointed openings, 4 feet wide, and about 6 feet above the floor. They are roughly cut through, and were probably lined with ashlar and fitted with gratings of some sort. They are not original, and seem to have been made to allow some of the heated air of the calefactorium to pass into the frater, though to small purpose.¹ Below these openings, despite the wall being an interior one, is a high plinth, as on the outside of the frater. In the south end is, towards the east, an acutely pointed arch, 8 feet wide, rebated all round to hold a window frame for the glass. Towards the west is a narrow entrance doorway, with a pointed opening over, also rebated for a frame with glass (see Fig. 17). There are no marks whatever of fittings or furniture anywhere round the room, but in the north-west corner is a hole through which passed a lead service pipe from the lavatory in the cloister.² Outside the warming-house, on the south, is a yard between the frater and the dorter range, with a wall on the river bank. On the east side of it was a building of the same date as the warming-house, 30 feet long and about 13 feet wide, with an entrance from the yard. It had a vaulted roof and a chamber above, and was probably a store for wood and fuel for the warming-house fires. Along the frater wall was a pentise from the warming-house as far as the cutwater at the end of the frater, and a plank bridge was carried from the yard wall to the cutwater across the arm of the stream which here runs under the frater.³

and section of the arrangement described. It is a matter for speculation how the heating was managed, and without exposing the monks in the warming-house to the risk of asphyxiation.

The warming-house at Tintern is a very curious room. It was originally about 38 feet long by 14 feet wide, and had in the middle a hearth 7 feet long and 3 feet wide, enclosed by open pointed arches; those on the north and south being wide and lofty, and the eastern and western low and narrow. On each side in continuation of the north and south arches are narrow arches forming passages between the hearth and the side walls. The north end of this room is destroyed, but the rest is still fairly perfect.

FIG. 17.—Southern elevation of the warming-house and its superstructure.
(The dotted lines have been added to show the original pitch and disposition of the roof.)

The plank bridge probably continued across the main stream to the opposite bank, to bring fuel over.¹

At the head of the day-stairs an archway on the right opens westwards into a small lobby with a round barrel vault. The lobby has a doorway on the left leading to a large circular vice (now nearly destroyed), and a second doorway in front, which was secured on the inside by a swinging bar. This doorway leads up four steps to a passage with a pointed barrel vault and a triple lancet window on the south.² Opposite the window is a tall pointed doorway, which had double doors and an inner drawbar, opening with a step up into a large room over the warming-house. This has a stone vault, with plain chamfered cross and wall ribs, resting on a central pillar and pilasters round the walls, and is lighted by two triple lancet windows on the ¹ The apartment here described as the calefactorium has hitherto been invariably described by all writers on the abbey as the kitchen, because it is the only building round the cloister where the large fire-places that are supposed to be necessary in a monastic kitchen may be seen. The error is quite pardonable, because (1) the arrangements of the actual kitchen (which is on the west side of the frater, and has until now been called the buttery) have been so destroyed as to have been hitherto unintelligible, and (2) until the writer raised the question, the calefactorium had been placed elsewhere, and so did not dispute the title of the so-called kitchen. With the exception of the fire-places, there are no marks whatever of any fittings or fixtures such as would have been found in a kitchen, and the fire-places themselves bear no traces of bars or hooks of any kind. There is also no service door to the frater through which food could be passed, and the openings in the frater wall were certainly not for this purpose, since they are 6 feet from the floor.

That the apartment is the calefactorium there is now no doubt. In the first place, both it and the actual kitchen come in the right order of the buildings named in the direction for the Sunday procession: "capitulum, auditorium, dormitorium et dormitorii necessaria, calefactorium, refectorium, coquina, cellarium." Secondly, in other Cistercian houses, e.g. Kirkstall, Tintern, Rievaulx, and Beaulieu, the warming-house occupied this position, and we know that it was here at both Cîteaux and Clairvaux. The calefactorium has hitherto been supposed to have been under the dorter, as it certainly was in Benedictine houses; there is, however, documentary proof that in the Cistercian abbeys it was an independent building, and that it adjoined the frater. Thus at Meaux, where the progress of the buildings is carefully described, we find that after the completion of the dorter range under the second abbot, between 1160 and 1182, the monks' frater of stone was begun and finished, and that the third abbot himself built the warming-house and kitchen by degrees as he could. The actual entry is as follows:

"Defuncto domino Philippo abbate nostro 2^o, anno Domini 1182, ordinatus est Thomas in abbatem; qui sub ipso xviii. annis prioris officium exercebat. Hujus igitur primo tempore, Willielmus filius Willielmi de Rule, persona ecclesie de Cotyngam, refectorium monachorum lapideum inchoavit et propriis expensis perfecit quale nunc cernitur. Abbas autem ipse Thomas calefactorium et coquinam paulatim ut potuit edificavit." Chronica de Melsa, i. 217.

At Newenham the south range was reconstructed by Abbot John of Gedding-ton, 1324-1338, who "inceptit novum refectorium quod ejus successor complevit. Idem fecit vollam calefactorii." Oliver, Monasticon Diocesis Exoniensis, 364.

At Louth Park the dorter and the warming-house were clearly two distinct buildings, for it is recorded of Abbot Richard of Dunham, 1227-1246: "Dormitorium Monachorum et Calefactorium cum capitulo et omnibus quæ super et sub sunt in eisdem, et Claustrum scilicet quantum abbatat super dictum Dormitorium et super Calefactorium a fundamentis inceptit." Chronicon Abbatie de Parco Lude, 13, 14.

north, and a wide double lancet on the south, recessed to correspond with the passage window.¹ There are marks on the walls and pillar of partitions running north and south; the east and west walls have no cuts or marks.

Much uncertainty exists as to the use of this room. The drawbar of the doorway and the fastenings of the passage door could only be used by someone inside, and though of course the swinging bar may be of later date than the Suppression, when the courts of the Liberty of Fountains were held here, the drawbar was provided for from the first. The absence of a garderobe shews that it can hardly have been a living or sleeping room of one of the officers of the abbey. Possibly, being fireproof, this was the muniment room of the abbey, for which it is admirably suited, and the door fastenings may have been to keep intruders out while important documents were being examined, though this seems an overcautious provision. The room is now converted into a museum for the numerous articles found during excavations in and about the abbey. Many of these are of the greatest interest, especially an extraordinary collection of fragments of mediæval pottery. There is also a very fine effigy of a knight, circa 1310, removed from the presbytery, the details of which are deserving of close study.

Above this room, and originally reached by the circular vice outside the lobby, was another chamber of the same size. It is now almost totally ruined, and only accessible by a ladder. Part of the south wall is left, with a deep round-headed recess, $7\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide, about 4 feet deep, and 8 feet high, lighted by a small square-headed loop. West of this was an arch, about $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide, opening on to an external platform about 3 feet wide.² Mr. J. A. Reeve suggests that there was a crane here for hauling up wool or other stores from below. The west wall is completely gone, and all that remains on the north are the sills of two lancet windows, and the beginning of the corbelled slope of the gable. This room was doubtless a store. On the east is the remaining chimney stack of the warming-house fire; it is square at the base, gradually diminishing upwards, and ending with a tall circular shaft that has lost its top. Against the chimney are the marks of the original roof, which was a steep one, with the ridge north and south, and covering the whole block from the dorter to the frater.³ In later times the roof seems to have been lowered.

² See Fig. 17.

The western half, which is the more perfect of the two, has a pointed arch in the middle, with two round arches on each side, originally supported by marble pillars, all now lost, but their section may be recovered from the curious sockets cut out for the end pillars. The pillars stood on a broad bench, with a lead or stone trough below, so contrived that the monks could stand in front to wash their hands, and get up and sit on the bench with their feet in the trough for the usual Saturday mandatum or foot-washing. The trough was supplied with water from a pipe in the middle, which came up through the bench, and had a branch through the wall into the corner of the frater. The overflow ran off under the trough, and was carried away by a down pipe. The eastern lavatory was arranged similarly to the other, but the easternmost arch is pointed instead of round, through the intervention of a buttress between the lavatory and the warming-house door.¹ The supply pipe had a branch passing through the wall into the warming-house, and another into the corner of the frater.²

THE FRATER.³

The refectorium or frater was the dining-hall of the monks. It was entered from the cloister by a richly-moulded round-headed door,⁴ with four detached jamb shafts on each side, and an elaborate group of slender triple shafts to carry the soffit. The rear arch has an outer order and a hoodmold. The door was double. In the cloister is a step clear of the door, and there are two other steps inside, which, though modern, probably represent old ones. The frater itself, instead of standing east and west against the cloister, as in Benedictine, Cluniac, and Canons' houses, in the Cistercian abbeys stands north and south, with its end only against the cloister.⁵ The

Fig. 18.—View of the south-east corner of the cloister, showing the chapter-house, parlour, frater, and other dormitory, the eastern division of the monastery, and the superstructure of the warming-house.

reason of this is difficult to see. It has been suggested that it was the desire to bring the kitchen into direct communication with the cloister (from which in houses of other Orders it was almost always detached), because amongst the Cistercians the monks themselves acted as cooks by turns. This may be so, but it should be noted that among the Cluniacs, where the same rule was followed, the frater always stands east and west with the kitchen away from the cloister.

At Fountains the frater was a large hall, about 110 feet long and 46 feet wide. It had a central arcade of five arches carried by four round marble pillars, 15 inches in diameter. The end arches rested on large corbels still remaining, but the pillars have all disappeared except part of the base of the southernmost. The roof was of wood, and of two wide spans with high gables. The ground story extends up to a string that runs all round under the windows. Besides the doorway from the cloister on the north, and the two openings into the calefactorium on the east, here 3 feet 3 inches from the floor, there are two doorways in the west wall, one to the kitchen, the other to the wall-pulpit. The frater was well lighted on all sides. On the east are six wide and lofty lancets, with inner jamb shafts, and good mouldings; the capitals have the square abacus. On the south each of the main divisions contains a pair of lancets set close together, with dividing shafts, and a round opening in the gable above. These round windows were, however, subsequently blocked, probably on account of a lowering of the pitch of the roofs. At the north end were similar pairs of lancets, but the round windows were omitted, because the cloister roof on the outside made it necessary both to shorten the lights and raise their sills; in fact, their springing lines are level with the string above the other windows and the sills at about half their height. The west side has six lancets like those opposite, but the northern three are set in the back of the large recess that contained the wall-pulpit and its stair, and were represented towards the frater by three arches with plain mouldings, carried by tall marble shafts, now destroyed. From the southern of the three arches projected the pulpit for the reader; it was supported on a very fine corbel, now the only part of it that is left. The upper part of the wall upon which the arches stood has been extensively repaired, and it is uncertain whether it was horizontal or stepped. The doorway to the pulpit was reached by four steps from the floor, and has the stringcourse carried over it like a hood-mold. It opens into a small lobby at the foot of the stair, with a barrel vault, and a round-headed recess on the north for books. From the lobby is a straight ascent of seventeen steps, 4 feet wide, broken by landings into three series of three, ten, and four steps respectively.¹ Against the south wall of the frater, and extending down three-fifths of the length of the side walls, are broad platforms on which stood the tables for the brethren. On the end platform, which is 8 feet wide, was the high table for the president. The side platforms, which are 6 feet wide, are divided into two equal lengths of 28 feet by a passage 3 feet wide.² There were thus four separate tables, which stood on curious stone twin posts, 8 inches thick and 12 inches wide, with chamfered edges; the stumps of most of them are left.³ Behind the tables were stone benches, on which the monks sat. On the west side, between the door to the pulpit and the service door from the kitchen, is a continuation of the platform, but with no remains of stone pillars for the tables or of the bench against the wall. Probably a sideboard or some such piece of furniture stood here, or maybe a table for the novices. Two courses above the string, in the midst of the south wall, behind the dais, are one large and two small pin-holes in line, apparently for a canopy over the president's seat. At the north end of the east wall, clear of the tables, are the marks of some fixtures reaching as high as the string, probably racks or shelves for pots and drinking vessels, and in the corner is a hole for a service pipe from the lavatory. Some piece of furniture has also stood in the north-west corner of the frater, with a service pipe to it from the lavatory. At Clairvaux the frater is described in 1517 as containing a fountain for washing the drinking vessels, and a rack beside it to put them away in, and there was doubtless a similar arrangement at Fountains. Some of the plate was also kept here. An inventory of the abbey, made about 1537, describes as "In the Frater, xv sponys ungilt weyng xx^{ti} unces."⁴

The service door from the kitchen is a most interesting piece of arrangement. It consists on the frater side of a round-headed arch, 6 feet 7 inches wide, and 9 inches deep. In this is an opening, 4 feet 8 inches wide, extending down to the floor, which has

³ One or two similar posts are lying in the ruins at Jervaulx.

lost its top and sill. The sides curve outwards on plan towards the kitchen for about 15 inches, and then continue straight; the width of the opening being thus increased to 5 feet 1 inch. The marks on the sides of the opening, as well as its form, shew that it contained a circular turntable, 5 feet in diameter, rotating on a vertical axis. This turntable would have several shelves, and was divided vertically by a partition. On both sides of this partition were iron bolts, which shot into holes in the stonework when the turntable was not in use, and the machine could not be turned until the bolt on the frater side, as well as that on the kitchen side, had been drawn. On the arch on the frater side are two pin-holes, one on each side, and a third pin-hole on the north jamb. The front of the arch has on each side, 4 feet 4½ inches from the ground, the stumps of two iron pins, 4 inches apart, one above the other, leaded in. These pins and holes probably mark the place of a broad shelf crossing the arch, corresponding to the shelf on top of a half-door so common in college kitchens and butteries.

A hatch or service door in the same place as at Fountains was the usual arrangement, and it helps to fix the site of the kitchen. Other examples may be seen at Rievaulx, Beaulieu, and Tintern. In the last named case there is a small hatch in the west wall of the frater, which was fitted with a door, and beside it in the end wall is a shallow recess, which had in front a wooden shelf, 3 feet long and 2 feet broad, so contrived that it could be let down to hold dishes, and be folded back on hinges into the recess when not in use.

From the way in which the frater plinths at Fountains run right through from end to end it is quite clear that it was built all at one time, together with most of the south side of the cloister, and this is borne out by the extreme regularity of the masonry in all four walls. There is a clean break of joint between it and the warming-house, which was built after it, but the building of the kitchen seems to have followed at once, because it was wanted first.

THE KITCHEN.

The coquina or kitchen at Fountains is a very curious room, and until the writer succeeded in making out its arrangements, they had not been explained, nor the real use of the place recognized. Hitherto it has been called the buttery, and the service door to the frater the buttery hatch. This mistake was quite excusable, since there were apparently no fireplaces or other signs of a kitchen, and the room on the other side of the frater, with its two great fireplaces, seemed admirably fitted for the purpose. The real kitchen is entered from the cloister by a plain round-headed door, and measures $34\frac{1}{2}$ feet from north to south, but from east to west widens from 33 feet on the north to 37 feet on the south. The usual place for the fireplaces is against the walls, but in this case there were two, each about $13\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide, placed back to back in the middle of the room. One faced north, and was about 5 feet deep; the other faced south, and was 6 feet deep. The chimney-pieces rested on broad piers on each side, from which the thrust was carried by vaulted passages to the east and west walls. The two passages differed in character. The western one was the wider, and had its vault carried by three chamfered ribs in continuation of the divisions of the fireplaces; but it is now utterly ruined and there remain only the springers in the wall and the plinth of its pier. The eastern passage is perfect; it is covered by a segmental barrel vault, to support which two modern buttresses have been built on the west. The great central chimneys were carried up vertically, and had a deep arch on each side over the vaulted passages below; they thus divided the kitchen into two parts. The north part has on the east the service door to the monks' frater; on the north an entrance door from the cloister; and on the west, where the greater part of the wall is before the fire of 1147, was a service door or hatch into the frater of the conversi. In the north wall, placed high up, so as to clear the cloister roof, are three pointed rebated openings, with high stepped sills. This half of the kitchen had a stone vault of three bays, which rested on the south against the great chimney breast. The southern half of the kitchen has on the east a blank wall with projecting plinths like those outside the frater; on the south a wide round-headed arch towards the east, and a door with a locker beside it towards the west; on the west the wall has been partly refaced. Above the openings in the south wall are two round-headed windows. The vault of this part of the kitchen was in two bays only,¹ and has evidently been raised higher than was at first intended. The traces of the arrangements of the kitchen are fairly clear. The fireplaces are destroyed, and were it not for the remaining east pier and the plinth of the west one, all traces of them of the kitchen could be vaulted in three and the other in two bays; a feature that has hitherto been difficult to understand.

would have been lost. Their sites are somewhat obscured by modern buttresses and large stones found during the excavations, but the springers of the chimney pieces and the cuts for the division wall prove that the arrangement was as described above. For some time previous to the Suppression, a single fireplace seems to have been found enough, for the front of the southern one has been closed by large slabs set on edge. The south end of the vaulted passage on the east has also been closed by a wall to convert it into a cupboard or closet, and the plinth, which is carried through it, cut away for shelves, etc. The north half of the kitchen has three lockers or recesses in the north wall; the westernmost of these is hollowed in front, as if a bowl or bason on a shaft had stood against it.¹ Between the easternmost locker and the end wall are the marks of a large cupboard or set of shelves. In the east wall, between the service door and the vaulted passage, two shelves have been fixed. The door from the cloister was a folding door. The southern part of the

in place, but when the kitchen was cleared of rubbish it was found lying near the surface over the spot where it now lies, and to which it was let down.

kitchen has been divided into two stories by a wooden floor on a level with the window sills, and a similar floor has been inserted in the westernmost bay of the northern part. These were probably reached by ladders, and there was access from one to the other through the arch over the vaulted passage on the west of the great chimneys. The corresponding arch on the east appears to have been at the same time fitted with partitions and shelves as a store-place. The west wall of the kitchen has been in great part refaced; but it appears to be all of the work previous to the fire, as does part of the north wall. High up towards the south end of the west wall is part of a corbel table built in.

It is somewhat doubtful how it was intended to cover in the kitchen. The vault was certainly a later insertion in the walls, not provided for even in the rebuilding, and the twin fireplaces with their flanking arches are of the same date.

Over the kitchen vault was a chamber or chambers, reached by a wooden stair from the upper floor of the great western range.¹ It is now utterly ruined, and the jambs of three windows on the south are the only traces of its existence (see Fig. 21).

Outside the kitchen, on the south, is a yard between the frater and the cellarium, extending down to the river. At the north end was a pentise against the kitchen, with a steep lean-to roof rising from a low wall, and dropped at the west end so as not to obscure a window there in the cellarium. This pentise was divided midway, just to the west of the kitchen buttress. On the east side of the yard was another pentise against the frater wall below the windows. It was apparently subdivided by wooden partitions into various outhouses. From it a wooden bridge seems to have been carried to the cutwater at the angle of the frater and across to the other side of the river. The south end of the yard is now closed by a wall which appears to be old. It contains a doorway of doubtful date, but probably modern, though it may replace an earlier opening of another kind. There is also near its east end a shoot into the river, now blocked on the north, perhaps for a garderobe or for getting rid of kitchen stuff.

There is good reason to suppose that the three buildings forming the southern range which we now see are the first that were built of stone on the site. Neither the warming-house nor the frater contains any portions of older work; and although the west and part of the north wall of the kitchen belong to work before the fire, the greater part of it is contemporary with the frater and warming-house.

The older parts of the kitchen probably belong to one in course of construction at the time of the fire, and afterwards incorporated in the new work; but the lower part of its south wall, to the west of the yard door, is clearly contemporary with the cellarium. The rest of the south wall, despite the round-headed windows, is contemporary with the frater. It has been suggested in another place that the buildings of the southern range are among the edificia sumptuosa said to have been built by Abbot Robert, 1170-1179. The earlier buildings on the site were no doubt of wood, and the irregular setting out of the existing frater, so markedly shewn on plan, is probably due to the stone building having been carried up round the smaller wooden structure.

On the cloister side the wall to the west of the kitchen door is all of the earliest work. The whole of the west side of the cloister is also anterior to the fire, but except a few feet at each end it has been entirely cased and buttressed, the reason for which will presently be seen. Three courses of the old masonry are, however, still visible all along above the casing, under the string below the upper floor windows. They were not covered up because the casing only extended to the height of the cloister roof, the wall plate of which rested on the top of it. Below the three courses was originally a stringcourse, but it has been cut off; traces of it remain at the south end and along the old piece of the kitchen wall, but it does not shew at the north end. The added buttresses divide the wall into ten bays. The first bay, reckoning from the south, is of the earliest work, but has been interfered with in the middle, where there is a small loop, only $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, with wide splays, now blocked. The second bay is a projection, partly a porch, partly a buttress, with a round-headed doorway with marble abaci to the jamb shafts, clearly the work of Abbot John of Kent, who also probably added all the casing of the wall up to the church. The next six bays are simply recesses between the added plain and wide pilaster buttresses; each contained a stone bench, but except in the sixth bay the covering slabs have gone. The lower part of the seventh bay has been taken out and replaced by a thinner and apparently modern wall. The ninth bay has, towards the north, a plain round-headed door. The tenth and last bay is partly of the later work, and partly of the earlier work, which is bonded into the church wall.

Before leaving the cloister, attention should be called to a feature in the middle of the garth. This is a square stone platform, on which rests a large stone octagonal bason, about 7 feet in diameter, 2 feet high, and $15\frac{1}{2}$ inches deep. In the middle of the sloping bottom is a hole about 14 inches square, with a small sinking opposite each side, as if to hold plugs for a central column of some kind. This bason was removed here from the cellarium some thirty years ago, where it had been used as a crab-mill, because it was supposed to have stood here originally, and to have formed part of a great laver or conduit. Possibly it now stands in its original place, but lavers in the middle of the cloister do not appear to have been the rule in England.¹ The cloister garth was simply a smooth grass plat, and was never used as a cemetery; but burials were permitted in the cloister alley, before the chapter-house door, as at Waverley and elsewhere.

THE CELLARER'S BUILDING.

The range of buildings on the west side of the cloister at Fountains is no less than 300 feet long by 41 feet wide, and consists of two alleys, vaulted from end to end, with a central row of pillars; it has also an upper floor. This is the building called in the Consuetudines the cellarium, a loose term which gives no clue to its actual use, since it practically included all those parts of the abbey in the cellarer's department.² The records of Fountains do not throw any light on the question, but those of two of its daughters contain clear proof that this building was for the accommodation of the conversi or lay brothers; their frater and other offices forming the ground floor, while the upper floor was their dorter. Thus at Meaux, after describing the building of the monks' dorter and the rest of the eastern range, and of the frater and the buildings flanking it, the chronicler states that the fourth abbot, Alexander (1197-1210), "refectorium conversorum ab abbate Thoma inceptum perfecit; et domum superiorem, scilicet dormitorium eorundem, inchoavit."³ The dormitorium conversorum was finished by the fifth abbot, Hugh (1210-1220).⁴ Its position is fixed and costly, as is apparent till this daie." Rites of Durham, 70. The base of this laver still remains in the middle of the cloister. The lavatories at Wenlock, Clairvaux, Mellifont, and Maulbronn, already noticed above, must have resembled the one at Durham, but they opened out of the cloister alley opposite the frater door, instead of standing in the centre of the cloister.

on the west side of the cloister by two entries: one recording that Abbot William (1372-1396) led inter alia part of the monks' cloister "ab ostio rectorii monachorum usque ad dormitorium conversorum";¹ the other that Abbot Burton (1396-1399) "ipsam partem claustrum a dormitorio monachorum usque ad dormitorium conversorum juxta ecclesiam (i.e. the north or church side of the cloister) fecit tabulis plumboque reparari."² At Kirkstall the first stone buildings are recorded to have been, besides the church, "utrumque dormitorium monachorum scilicet et conversorum, utrumque etiam rectorium, claustrum, et capitulum, etc."³ i.e. all the buildings round the cloister, and since the positions of the monks' dorter and frater are known, there is no doubt that the frater and dorter of the conversi formed the western range. The dormitorium conversorum is mentioned in the *Annales de Crokesden*⁴ among the buildings erected by Abbot London (1242-1269).

As the division of the abbey buildings into two great groups for the use of the monks (monachi) and lay brothers (conversi) respectively is a feature peculiar to the Cistercians, a few words on the difference between the two classes may make matters clearer. Both monachi and conversi were equally monks in that they had taken the three monastic vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, but the monachi spent their time in church and cloister, and never left the abbey precincts except in cases of necessity. They were not necessarily priests, although in course of time most of them became so, and then their life differed little from that of the regular canons. The conversi, or fratres laici as they were also called (in contradistinction to the monachi, who were fratres clerici), were practically monks who could not read. They were not necessarily of humble origin, but might be, and often were, men of good family who desired to enter the monastic life, and being unlettered could only do so by becoming conversi, in which condition they always remained, since a conversus could never become a monachus. They had charge, under the cellarer, of all the secular and external affairs of the monastery, and many of them lived in the granges or farms, which they worked, under the direction of obedientiaries chosen from among themselves. When resident in the abbey, as some of them always were, they kept certain of the hours in the church like the monks, and at the same time, but inasmuch as they could not read they substituted for the regular quire offices certain prayers and psalms which they learned by heart.

As has already been pointed out, the nave of the church was the quire of the conversi, and the buildings for their accommodation, which included a dormitory, frater, infirmary, etc. were in immediate connection therewith, just as the monks' buildings adjoined their part of the church. The great size of the buildings for the conversi has often been commented on. Nothing is known of the number of inmates of the abbey at Fountains, but at Waverley at the end of the twelfth century there were 120 conversi and 70 monks, and at Louth Park during the second quarter of the thirteenth century 150 conversi and 66 monks. At Meaux in 1349 the conversi were only seven in number, all of whom died of the great pestilence, as well as 32 out of 42 monks then in the abbey.

After the middle of the fourteenth century the conversi in this country seem as a class to have died out, and to have been replaced by hired servants and labourers; probably because the gradual spread of education and other causes had extinguished the class from which they had been formerly drawn. Meaux is one of the few English abbeys where they are known to have been continued, but their number is not recorded, and in the time of Abbot William of Scarborough (1372-1396) they all struck work and were superseded by monks.¹ Their buildings were then put to other uses. At Hayles the cellarium had been converted into the abbot's lodging for some time before the Suppression, and a similar thing seems to have happened at Ford, where the sumptuous hall and other apartments of the abbot's house built by Abbot Chard in 1525 still remain in a most perfect state, extending westwards from the former site of the cellarium.²

The great building at Fountains is twenty-two bays long, and is now open from end to end. It was not so originally, for the two northernmost bays were cut off by a solid wall from the first, and the remainder of the building, although covered by a continuous series of vaults in the usual mediæval manner, was divided by stone partitions into three separate apartments. These cross walls have been removed in modern times to form a "vista," but three of them are shewn in Burton's plan, published in 1758. Owing to their not having been bonded into the side walls, only slight traces of them are left.

The main walls are of three or more distinct periods, and the architectural history can be followed only by careful examination of each bay. The first thirteen bays of the east wall, reckoning from the church southwards, are all of the work previous to the fire, but the corresponding bays of the west wall were all built after that event.¹ The remainder of the building southwards is of the same period as the frater, kitchen, and warming-house, but the lower part of the eastern wall, below the windows, from the kitchen southwards, seems to belong to the work built after the fire, and to have been left unfinished. All the doorways and windows of the older portion are round-headed, but the windows of the southern half have pointed heads.

The wall that originally cut off the two northernmost bays was not a mere partition, but an integral part of the building, and between it and the church are two wide and broad arches of unequal height, which carry a flight of steps leading from the church to the dorter of the conversi. These arches take up one-third of the area of this part of the building; the northern arch is very low, but the southern is of a good height, and formed a wide passage from one side to the other. The space on the east side of the arches received little light; it was bounded on the north by the church wall, here of the first work and quite plain, with a blind panel in its upper half; and on the south by the partition wall, now removed. The east wall contains in the first bay the jamb of an original doorway from the cloister, blocked up probably after the fire, when another doorway or arch was inserted in the second bay. The vaulting corbels on this side are insertions. The area on the west side of the arches has on the north a good doorway of the first work opening into the church; and on the west, a wide archway in the first bay, and two windows in the second.² The partition wall that formed the south end has been removed. This part of the cellarium appears to have been little more than a porch or lobby covering the door to the church.

Before describing the divisions of the remainder of this building, it will be better to take in order the architectural features.

On the east side the six bays southward of the cross wall are solid,³ owing to the cloister on the other side. The next, or ninth, bay contains an entrance doorway from the cloister. In the tenth bay are plain marks of a tall blocked opening, 5 feet 4 inches wide;

² The southernmost of these windows has at some time been cut down to make a doorway.

³ The filling in of the sixth bay has been rebuilt; see above, in the description of the cloister side of this wall.

FIG. 22.—Subvault of the cellarer's building, looking south.

this can hardly have been a doorway, but was more likely a recess in the wall for the porter, with a loop in the back looking into the cloister (see above). The eleventh bay has a blocked service hatch from the kitchen, with a curious recess, 3 feet wide, below it, on the floor level, the use of which does not appear. The next two bays are blind, owing to the kitchen on the other side; they are of the first work, but the masonry has been rebuilt in the middle portions. The remaining nine bays each contain a large pointed window of two continuous orders, rebated for the glass frame. The south end has two windows like those on the sides, but the easternmost has had the inner order cut out, perhaps before the Suppression, and a doorway (since removed) built within the window arch; no alteration has, however, been made to the sill. Below the south windows is a semi-octagonal stringcourse; it originally extended below the west windows also, but has been cut off, except a short piece at the south end. On the east side the stringcourse was begun at the south end and then discontinued; an interesting proof of the order of the work. The third, fourth, fifth, seventh, eighth, and tenth bays of the west wall (counting from the north) each contain a plain round-headed window. The sixth and eleventh bays both contain large doorways, 6 feet 3 inches wide, each originally fitted with folding doors and a drawbar. There is a similar doorway in the ninth bay, but only 5 feet 4 inches wide. The twelfth bay contains a round-headed window,¹ and what now appears to be a low doorway, 4½ feet wide. This, however, was originally two recesses, back to back, separated by a thin stone slab, and with their sills 3 feet from the floor; the depth of the inner recess was 23 inches. The thirteenth bay is blank, on account of a building outside. The next seven bays contain large pointed windows like those opposite, but the last two bays are blind, through the abutment of a building on the west. The vault covering the first seven bays south of the cross wall is all of one date, resting on corbels in the west wall and inserted half-octagon shafts in the east wall; it has no wall ribs. The seven pillars that carry it are polygonal, with circular bases, which have a simple moulding hollow on the top. The vaults of the remaining thirteen bays have wall ribs and spring from corbels in both side walls; they are, however, not of one date, and there are varieties in the corbels and supporting pillars. In the east wall the last ten corbels, which are all of a date, are on one level, but the two corbels intermediate between them and the series of vaulting shafts are inserted at a higher level. The eighth pillar and corbels in line with it are the latest in the range,¹ and were left to the last probably on account of a temporary wall dividing the earlier from the later work while this was in building; the pillar has an octagonal base, smaller than and different from the others, and the vault on the north of it is unusually narrow. The remaining pillars are all octagonal, with octagonal bases, but the mouldings vary; pillars 9-13 having flat members, and pillars 14-19 a slight hollow, like pillars 1-6. The last eight pillars have a slight ornament at the springing of the ribs, which rise out of the pillar without capitals or any intervening member. This ornament, which is also found on the eighth pillar, becomes richer towards the end of the row.

From the general resemblance of the vault of the cellarium to that of the warming-house and in the cellar of the infirmary, it is clear that although the corbels for it, and in the later bays the wall ribs, were provided from the first, the vault and its central pillars were not built until some time afterwards, perhaps not until just before Abbot John of Kent began his new cloister. It is also evident, from the differences already noted, that the vault was built in sections: first the seven bays next to the lobby, then that of the lobby itself; the last six bays followed next, then the five bays north of them; and finally the tenth and eleventh bays with the eighth pillar were put in between the two main sections of the building. To carry the thrust of the new vaulting the wall next the cloister was subsequently thickened and buttressed, probably by Abbot John of Kent.

With regard to the divisions of the cellarium, there can be little doubt that the four bays south of the cross wall formed a distinct apartment, as shewn on Burton's plan. It was lighted on the west by three windows, and had a wide entrance doorway. There are no marks of any fittings or furniture, but it was probably a store for beer and other provisions. Burton's plan also shews a partition cutting off the next two bays, with an entrance on the south towards the east end of the partition wall. This is probably an old arrangement, and it is to be noted that the vaulting shafts in the east wall of the seventh bay have great cuts in them for some large piece of furniture, and there are similar cuts on the north side only of the eighth bay; perhaps the corresponding cuts on the south were in the removed partition wall. Probably this was the buttery, conveniently placed so as to serve both fraters. The ninth bay has a door at each end, and was the entry from the outer court to the cloister. The tenth bay was included in the entry, and very likely the two bays formed the outer parlour or auditorium juxta coquinam of the Consuetudines.

The seat for the porter seems to have been enclosed by a wooden partition "for warmness." There can be no doubt that the remaining twelve bays formed the refectorium or frater of the conversi; and this will be the more evident if it be compared with the parallel frater of the monks. It had a service hatch from the kitchen; the tables were clearly arranged round the walls, which accounts for the string-course below the side windows having been cut off; and, whether intentionally or not, there is a dais at the upper end, through the floor of the last four bays being raised over the tunnels that here pass under the building. All remains of fittings have long since disappeared, but racks or presses for cups and other vessels may well have stood against the blind walls at the lower end. If there was a lavatory, it was fixed against the partition wall at the north end; there was perhaps a small one in the recess in the west wall for washing up things.

The external features of the west side of the building exhibit several interesting points. The first twelve bays are divided by bold pilaster buttresses of two stages, the lower having the angles chamfered off so as to be semi-octagonal in plan. The buttresses rise from a good but plain continuous plinth,¹ which is carried round them; and were continued up to the corbel table below the eaves of the upper story. The buttresses that flank the doorways are much narrower than those between the windows. The archway in the first bay has two square outer orders and no hoodmold. The three doorways have no hoodmolds, but are each of two orders, the inner chamfered, the outer square; in the third doorway, however, both orders are chamfered. The middle doorway, that forming the entrance to the cloister, has marks of a wooden porch over it. The two northernmost windows are not so high as the rest, but are of the same width. The windows in the tenth and twelfth bays are a course higher up than those to the north, which are all on one level. The upper windows of the first eleven bays are all alike, with flat pilasters between, and rest on a stringcourse carried round the buttresses. In the twelfth bay both stringcourse and window are at a higher level. Covering half the twelfth and all the next bay is a building of considerable interest, which will be described presently. Beyond it, southwards, are seven bays with windows, divided by flat pilaster buttresses rising from a plinth. The lower windows have two chamfered continuous orders, but no hoodmolds. The upper windows also have no hoodmolds; they rest on a stringcourse, which is carried round the buttresses. The nineteenth and twentieth bays on this side are the two northernmost of the four bays of the building which are built over tunnels for the passage of the river; the lower parts of their walls are therefore carried by round arches crossing the water, and the intermediate buttress is continued downwards, and forms a pointed cutwater. The last two bays on this side are covered by an important building, which will be described in its place. The nine exterior bays of the east wall clear of the kitchen southward are precisely like those of the west wall, but continue without break to the end of the building. The four last bays are carried by round arches across the stream, and the three intermediate buttresses are brought down and form pointed cutwaters. The four tunnels are from 9 to 10 feet wide, and built throughout of stone.

The building against the middle of the west wall of the cellarium is two stories high, and is about 26 feet long by 18 feet wide on the outside. Its north end is covered for quite half the width by a broad flight of steps, with a narrow passage between it and the cellarium wall. This passage leads to a sort of lobby or porch, covered by a half-barrel vault, and at some time closed by a wooden screen. On the east was formerly a small recess, now cut down to form a doorway; and opposite to it, on the floor level, is a round-headed recess, about 4 feet wide, $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet deep, and 4 feet high, which has had a wooden shelf across at the springing line of the arch. On the south a tall round-headed doorway, 3 feet 5 inches wide, opens into a room about $15\frac{1}{2}$ feet long and $12\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide. This has a round-headed window on the west, and two narrow square-headed lights, with a fireplace between, on the south. It is covered by a stone vault carried by three ribs, radiating from a short pier in the middle of the north wall: one to the south-east corner of the room, where it rests on a pier; the other two to corbels on either side the fireplace. The fireplace has a projecting segmental hood carried by corbels. This room was probably the cellarer's checker or office. The broad flight of steps mentioned above leads up to a wide round-headed arch, through which a few of the steps are continued. This arch opened into a lobby, lighted by two windows on the west and another on the south, with an ascending flight of stairs on the east to the dorter of the conversi. Between this stair and the north wall are numerous holes and cuts in the east wall for a piece or pieces of furniture of some sort. The east side has also the marks of two gabled roofs, which cut across the windows in a way suggestive of their having belonged to a wooden predecessor of the present structure.

Before describing the dorter of the conversi, it should be pointed out that the north end of the building just described was covered by a pentise carried along the cellarium wall as far as a wide entrance doorway (inserted after the fire) into the church. This pentise is now destroyed, but there are plain marks of it at each end and against the wall, where its lean-to roof rested just below the stringcourse, and the foundation of it remains underground. Its north end originally ran through to the church, but was afterwards returned at right angles to form a porch to the entrance arch in the cellarium wall, probably when the outer doorway into the church was blocked up. There was also a pentise against the west wall of the building described above, and another seems to have run out from it westwards to some building in the outer court.

The dormer of the conversi occupied the whole length and breadth of the upper floor of the cellarium. It was apparently open from end to end, and covered by a lofty wooden roof of one span. Perhaps some may think a room 300 feet long too large for the purpose assigned to it, but even if every of the twenty-two bays on each side formed a cubicle, that would only give forty-eight in all, and the total number of cubicles was probably under forty. It is, however, of course possible that there were other cubicles in the middle. From the middle of the north end a wide flight of steps descends to a segmental-headed doorway, which had folding doors, opening into the south aisle of the church. By this stair the conversi went to their quire in the nave¹ on those nights on which they kept the night office. The north gable of the dormer was built upon the aisle wall, and the end covers two and a half bays (Fig. 23, post). The church wall here shews towards the dormer three of the pilaster buttresses, with a window in the west and east compartments, the intermediate one being blank. The eastern window has its sill at a higher level than the other, and is partly covered by the east wall of the dormer; the reason for this will appear presently. Between the western window and the buttress to the east of it are signs of the bond of a wall, part of which apparently remains below in the side of the stair. On the east of the bond there is no stringcourse below the windows, but one is found on the west of it, as well as above the windows, and this is also carried round the buttresses. The first window of the east wall has between it and the church a row of four holes, 6 feet 9 inches from the floor, but it is not easy to say what was fixed here. The first ten windows are all round-headed lights, exactly alike. Most have between them holes which conversi stopped short before reaching the church, and had a descending stair covered by a pentise along the cloister wall. Where the pentise joined the church there is a skew passage through the wall into the aisle. A similar arrangement existed at Netley.

mark the position of the wooden partitions dividing the cubicles. The position of these holes is usually close to the south window-jamb, shewing that the beds were placed immediately to the north of each window. Where the dorter crosses the kitchen the wall is much broken down, and there are now no signs of any steps to the room or rooms that were over the kitchen. The two windows next to the kitchen are of the same size as those to the north, but are not so high. The next four windows have the arches nearly a foot wider, and higher in proportion. The two windows beyond these have narrower and less lofty arches, while the last window again is wide and tall, with a large blocked lamp-niche beside it on the south. The south wall of the dorter had two windows, probably of the same pattern as those in the lower story, and set close together to light the passage between the cubicles. In the east end of the south wall is a wide doorway, which if not original is an early insertion, communicating by means of a wooden bridge with a detached building of doubtful purpose on the south.

On the west side, between the first (north) window and the end wall is a round-headed niche, $22\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, 30 inches high, and 20 inches deep, 4 feet 7 inches from the floor. Between the fifth and sixth windows is a pointed niche, $17\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, $25\frac{1}{4}$ inches high, and 17 inches deep, 4 feet above the floor. The first eleven windows are all alike, and have their inner arches of a uniform width of about 4 feet. The twelfth window and the seven beyond are on a higher level, and are 4 feet 8 inches across the opening. Between the twelfth and thirteenth windows is a wide round-headed doorway with hoodmold at the head of the stairs from the outside, and just to the north of it is a recess 30 inches wide, nearly 4 feet high, and 2 feet deep, 19 inches from the floor. From 6 inches upwards it has been rebated all round and fitted with shelves.

At Citeaux, Clairvaux, and other houses abroad, and at Kirkstall, Beaulieu, and Byland, and perhaps Whalley, in England, a broad lane intervened between the cloister and the cellarium. The object of this lane is obscure. It has been suggested that it was to cut off the sound of noisy trades carried on by the conversi in the cellarium, but this will not do, since the conversi did not use the cellarium as a workshop. Mr. Micklethwaite suggests that it was the claustrum conversorum which we know to have existed at Louth Park and elsewhere. This may be so; but whatever its original purpose, it was soon done away with or lost sight of early, for many abbeys were certainly built without it, and in the reconstruction of the buildings at Fountains after the fire of 1147 it was also omitted. Since, however, Fountains was planned by a monk of Clairvaux, and Kirkstall was colonised by monks from Fountains, the question has naturally arisen as to whether there was a lane originally at Fountains. It has already been shewn that the first thirteen bays of the east wall of the cellarium are all earlier than the fire, and were its buttresses and casing stripped off, we should have a plain wall extending from the church to the south side of the kitchen, such as might have formed the east side of a lane. Of a western wall, however, there were no remains, but the possible bond and existence of a fragment of it have already been noted. A trench was accordingly cut in September,

Fig 23.—Section of the north end of the cellarer's building, where it abuts against the church. The dotted lines have been added to show the lines of the first CELLARIUM 1888, across its probable line. This brought to light a massive foundation, 5 feet wide, at a distance of 24 feet 8 inches from the east wall, and exactly in the right place, which was traced southwards for at least nine bays.

But the existence of a lane, which thus seemed to have been proved, did not explain certain difficulties, such as the absence of all traces of the older cellarium against the church, the complete state of the aisle wall and its original windows to the west, and the blind bay of the aisle with its stopped stringcourses above the supposed lane.

These and other considerations have shewn that the theory of a lane can not be upheld, but that, as has been suggested to me by Mr. Harold Brakspear, what we really have are the remains of the first cellarium, which abutted upon the cloister, like its successor, without the intervention of a lane.

The acceptance of this explanation, moreover, clears up all the difficulties at the church end, where the aisle windows severally fall into place, the blind bay and the stopping of the stringcourses become intelligible, and the window with the shortened sill is seen to have been so built to clear as far as possible the dorter roof (Fig. 23). The width of the old cellarium corresponds closely to that of the original eastern range, and its length is probably indicated by the remains of the east wall. It is possible that, like the cellarium at Kirkstall, it had a rere-dorter extending westwards from its south end, and a piece of wall which stretches in an oblique direction from the corner of the later cellarer's checker may have formed part of it. In that case there must have been an underground watercourse to flush it. Such a channel may well have started from the bend of the stream just below the mill and proceeded nearly in a straight line through the rere-dorter, under the southern range, through the old rere-dorter of the monks on the east, and so again into the stream. But this suggestion can only be put to the test by excavation.

It is probable that the night stair from the first dorter of the lay brethren was arranged like that at Jervaulx, but afterwards altered to descend straight into the church as in the later building. This would account for the inserted door that preceded the existing one in the same position.

THE RERE-DORTER OF THE CONVERSI.

At the extreme south end of the west wall of the dorter of the lay brothers was a door opening into a building which here abuts against the cellarium, and covers the last two bays. This was the rere-dorter of the conversi. It consists of a lofty basement, standing east and west, and divided midway by a strong longitudinal wall, carried up to the first floor; and at the bottom of each half is a wide channel built of masonry, through which the stream still continually flows (Fig. 24). There are no openings in the northern division below the first floor, but the south wall of the southern division has nine tall round-headed archways at the ground level, forming originally a lower and independent series of privies, connected later with the lay brothers' infirmary. On the first floor were two parallel chambers on a level with the great dorter floor, each with a row of seats back to back against a wooden partition standing on the division wall. Across the west end was a passage. The rere-dorter was lighted by two pairs of windows on the north, an upper and two lower windows on the west, and three on the south. The northern half had originally in the east end of the north wall a door communicating with a building on the north older than the present cellarium. This is now filled up and reduced to a small square-headed window. The southern of the lower west windows has been made into a doorway with shouldered head opening from a building on the west (Fig. 24), and the westernmost of the south windows has been replaced by a large two-light square-headed window. There was a high gabled roof; some of the holes for parts of its framing remain at the west end. Externally the western gable was carried by two blind arches of construction built across the water-ways, and had three pilaster buttresses, of which the middle one is stopped off just below the topmost window. On the south side the original windows are stopped off very short by a stringcourse, against which abutted a pentise covering the nine arches already mentioned. The seats within these arches were built of wood on timbers crossing the water-channel, but all have long disappeared, and the internal faces of the arches are much broken. The eighth arch has a rebate for a door, which is, however, not carried down to the floor, and between it and the ninth arch is part of an original wall running southwards. The pentise has subsequently been lowered, as may be seen by its roof-marks and the inserted window cutting through the stringcourse; it was entered by a doorway at the west end from a building on that side.

There can be little doubt that, as regards date, the lay brothers rere-dorter is contemporary with the northern half of the cellarium, and that when it was built, not only was the cellarium planned as we now see it, but that the lower part of its eastern wall and the four waterways at the south end had also been constructed. During the long pause that occurred before the southern half of the cellarium could be carried up, a wooden structure probably occupied its site, to serve which the rere-dorter was completed in stone, most likely because it stood in the stream. Its eastern end was afterwards taken down and the new work of the cellarium carried across it and bonded into it.

THE INFIRMARY OF THE CONVERSI.

This was a lofty and spacious hall, standing north and south, at least 90 feet long, and divided by arcades of six bays with octagonal pillars and pointed arches into a nave and aisles 60 feet wide. The building is much ruined, and it is not easy at first sight to make out its plan and arrangement. The greater part of it is built upon a platform over the river, carried by four parallel water-ways. The north end, which is the only part standing to any height, has in the middle a large round-headed doorway, 7 feet 3 inches wide, of two plain chamfered orders, with outer and inner hoodmolds. The doorway is flanked externally by pilaster buttresses in line with the arcades, and has over it corbels for a pentise along the whole front. This pentise appears to have had another running northwards from its east end to join the pentise against the west wall of the cellarer's checker, thus forming direct communication with the cellarium. Above the corbels of the pentise is a stringcourse, over which are in the main gable three large round-headed windows; but those in the ends of the aisles, as may be seen from the remaining example on the east, were quadrant-shaped, owing to their having to fit beneath the lean-to roof of the aisles. The interior of the north wall has a locker in the end of the west aisle, and a curious oblong recess between four pin-holes at the end of the east aisle; part of the western and the whole respond of the eastern arcade also remain. Of the arcades themselves, three bases on the east side, with parts of the pillars, alone are left. The arcades must have carried a clerestory to light the hall. On the east side the building overlaps at each end the rere-dorter of the conversi, which thus projects most awkwardly into the aisle. The reason for this does not appear; and it is the more difficult of explanation since the rere-dorter is undoubtedly the older building, and it would have been quite easy to have built the hall at right angles to it. It may be that the then course of the river rendered it necessary to set the hall obliquely. There are marks which prove that the east aisle, at any rate, was divided into chambers, and had an upper floor, from which a door opened into the first floor of the rere-dorter. Probably at the time of these alterations the arches in the lower part of the rere-dorter wall, which are insertions of the date of the hall, were chopped down, and the recesses fitted up with woodwork in some way. The line of the aisle roof may be seen just below the upper window of the rere-dorter gable; the two lower windows of which were blocked when the aisle was built.

In the two northernmost bays on the east, and four on the west, where the aisle walls crossed the water, in addition to the arch forming the end of each tunnel, another was built two feet in front of it, and upon them was built a series of wide arched recesses, two in each bay, and each 3 feet $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches deep, with a 12-inch wall, in which were windows, built upon the outer arch. The recesses were separated from the aisles by wooden screens, fitted to rebates in the stonework, and probably the space between the two arches below was flagged over. This arrangement may be followed on the west side, where the lower parts of the recesses are left at each end, with, at the north end, part of a window jamb. These remains seem to prove that the recesses were about 6 feet long, with two windows in each; their height probably was about 12 feet. They perhaps contained beds.¹

The south end of the east wall is much ruined, but it retains the lower part of a doorway leading into the pentise on the south side of the rere-dorter.

The south wall is completely destroyed, and there is nothing left even of its foundation underground; its probable limit is shewn by a pilaster buttress at the south-west corner, which seems to correspond with those at the northern angles.

Excepting a small fragment on the edge of the river, retaining the bottom of a large locker, the south end of the west wall has also been completely destroyed. The base of it, however, was found underground in 1888, with the lower part of a doorway, 5 feet wide, leading by a descent of three steps into an apartment on the west. By excavation, this was found to have been 27 feet wide and at least 40 feet long, with a doorway from without in its south-west corner; but it was impossible to ascertain more without injuring a number of fine trees. The north wall has long ago fallen into the river, and it is difficult to see how it abutted against the wall of the hall, which bears no sign of it.

There is much uncertainty as to the use of the building just described. Mr. Walbran, and others after him, thought it was the infirmary built by Abbot John of Kent; the actual infirmary of the monks being then thought to be the abbot's house. Looking at the fact that it communicated by a pentise with the cellarium, and was in actual connection with the re-dorter at the end of it, it is most likely that this building is the infirmatorium conversorum or farmery of the lay brothers, consisting of a large hall, with a garderobe on the east, and a kitchen on the west. Such an establishment was certainly included among the buildings of the abbey, as well as an infirmary for seculars, and there is positive documentary evidence of both at Pipewell and Meaux. At Pipewell they are enumerated in the list of places to which ligniferi were appointed ad portandum cotidie siccum boscum et mortuum for the fires.¹ At Meaux the infirmatorium conversorum is recorded to have been built by Abbot Driffild, 1249-69; and during the rule of Abbot William of Scarborough (1372-96). "Infirmatoria conversorum et sæcularium ab incolis et invalidis destituit. Coquinam infirmatorii conversorum diruit, etc."²

There still remains one other building to be noticed. This stood on the south bank of the river, close to the south-east corner of the cellarium. It was 50 feet long from east to west, but its width cannot be recovered, for with the exception of the west end of the north wall, which has a bold plinth, and some portions of the east and west walls, the building is utterly ruined. It was apparently of one story only, built on the slope of the bank on a high basement, and there was a wooden bridge to it from the dorter of the conversi. Its use is uncertain. At Clairvaux a building in the same position, in 1517, was the lodging of the novices.

A few yards to the west of the infirmary of the conversi the river is crossed by a charming little foot-bridge of three arches, placed obliquely across the stream (Fig. 25). The arches spring from pointed cutwaters, and have ribbed vaults, the northernmost with square ribs, the other two with chamfered ribs. The parapet is not original. At the north end of the bridge is a curtain wall with a round-headed doorway. This curtain extends from the corner of the infirmary hall to the easternmost of the two guest-houses.

Fig. 25.—Footbridge adjoining the eastern guesthouse.

THE GUEST-HOUSES.

The easternmost guest-house is a two-storied building, begun soon after the fire of 1147, consisting originally of a hall and solar, with round-headed windows and pilaster buttresses.

The hall measures 73 feet by $23\frac{1}{4}$ feet and is six bays long, with a central row of pillars to carry its vaulted roof. The vault rested on corbels round the walls, but has now gone, and several of the pillars, which are monoliths, have been wilfully overthrown by mischievous persons. The three southernmost pillars were octagonal in plan, and formed of four large and four small engaged shafts alternating. In the two northernmost pillars only the topmost and lowest sections are cut into shafts, which instead of continuing, die off into a circular pillar. Their capitals are also of plainer character than those of the other three pillars. The second and third pillars, counting from the north, have deep cuts in them for wooden fittings of some sort, and there is the base of a cross-wall on the line of the fourth pillar. The north end of the hall has in the western compartment the original doorway, now blocked up and converted into a small square-headed window. The other compartment has an original window, the head of which has been made square, seemingly at the same time as the other window. The east side of the hall has a large round-headed window in each compartment excepting in the third, where the wall is left blank. On the south, one compartment is blank, but the westernmost is pierced with a square-headed doorway that led to a wooden platform over the stream, covered by a pentise. Covering the south-west angle of the hall is a garderobe. It is divided by a longitudinal wall in such a manner that the eastern part formed a shaft from the solar, while the western part forms a garderobe on the ground floor, with an entrance from the hall, and a narrow loop on the south. The west side of the hall has no windows, and the second and third compartments from the north are blank. The first contained an entrance doorway, inserted probably in place of the old north door. The fourth compartment had a door into the space beneath an external staircase, and the fifth a doorway, perhaps originally a window, from the yard outside. The greater part of the west wall was covered by an external stair to the upper floor. This stair must have replaced an earlier one of wood, since it is not bonded to the hall wall. It had a place under it lighted by a window, and terminated in a broad landing or lobby, which also had a room under it with a southern window and a doorway from the hall. The upper floor or solar is somewhat later in date than the hall. Unfortunately, only the two gables remain, and there is nothing therefore to shew whether it was divided or not. Originally it was one fine room, lighted on the north by two handsome two-light windows with central and jamb shafts, with a large circular window in the gable above (Fig. 26). The east side probably had a fireplace over the solid compartment below, with windows corresponding to those of the hall. In the south end was one widely-splayed window, and in the south-west corner a doorway into the garderobe outside. The west side contained the door and perhaps one or more windows. In the thirteenth century some modifications were made in the solar, probably by Abbot John of Kent, most likely in the way of division. At that time a fireplace was inserted in the north gable, the round window blocked up, and the flue carried across it to a short circular chimney shaft capping the gable. The making of this fireplace also involved the blocking up of the window to the south of it (Fig. 26).

The western guest-house stands detached at a short distance from the west of the other, with which it makes a small angle; the one being placed with its main block almost east and west, while the other points in a north-north-easterly direction. Like its fellow the western guest-house was two-storied, but it differed in plan. It consisted of (1) a hall of four bays, the north side of which was covered, as regards the eastern half, by (2) a somewhat larger building of the same date, extending at right angles to it northwards. The area between the two guest-houses was closed on the south by a western extension of the garderobe of the eastern building; and on the north by a wall reaching from the corner of one to the corner of the other. A small doorway with chamfered sill in the east end of this wall formed a common entrance to both guest-houses, which practically stood in their own courtyard, since another wall extended westwards nearly in line with the other as far as the river, where it ended in a garderobe corbelled out over the water. From the staircase of the eastern guest-house to the north-east corner of the western hall is a wall with a doorway in its west end. From this a short curved passage or entry leads to another doorway in the hall wall.

Next to this is a second doorway and beyond it a window. The hall is $49\frac{1}{4}$ feet long and $24\frac{1}{4}$ feet wide, and was divided into two alleys by a central row of pillars. These had circular shafts, but the capitals and lower parts of the bases were octagonal, like the pillars in the subvault of the monks' dorter. From these pillars sprang the vault, which was a pointed one with simple chamfered ribs, resting on moulded half-octagon corbels against the walls; it had no wall ribs. The vault has long been destroyed, and of the three pillars only the base of the easternmost remains, but the hall walls are entire even for most of the upper story on the south and west, though reduced to only a few feet high on the east and north. The first or easternmost bay was cut off from the rest by a thick wall, of which the foundation only remains, with the pillar base standing on it. Besides the two doorways and window on the east, this bay has also a large and widely-splayed window on the south. The second bay has in the south wall a large fireplace, and opposite to it a doorway from the northern wing of the building. The third bay has a large south window, widely-splayed like that in the first bay; both shew signs of having been subdivided in later times. Opposite the window is a small doorway, probably to a pentise outside. The last bay has no openings, and is overlapped on the south by an external two-storied garderobe.¹ This has a vaulted chamber on the ground floor, entered by a small doorway in the west wall of the hall, with a drop into the stream, which runs through its basement. In the thick east wall is a shaft that communicated with the garderobe to the upper floor. The west wall of the hall contains two round-headed windows.

The upper story seems to have repeated the features of the ground floor. Thus the south wall had the same arrangement of windows and fireplace, the latter with a large projecting hood, and the west wall has two plain round-headed windows corresponding to those below, with a round window in the gable above. About the middle of the fourteenth century a fireplace was inserted between the west windows and a smoke shaft carried up to the apex of the gable, thus destroying the round window, which was then walled up, together with the northern of the two below it. The fireplace has been mutilated, but the low circular top of the chimney is still perfect. From the presence of the two fireplaces the upper floor must in later times have been divided into as many rooms or sets of chambers.

The north wing is ruined almost to its foundations. It has a doorway at the south end of its west wall, and there seems to have been another in the east wall at the foot of an external staircase there to the upper floor. In the north wall there was apparently a huge fireplace. In the fourteenth century this wing was divided into two alleys by a central row of columns, but only the half-octagon southern respond remains.¹ The alleys were also vaulted in three bays. To bear the thrust of this vault buttresses were built against the side walls; the lowest courses of three of them remain. On the north the mass of the great chimney-breast seems to have been considered sufficient abutment. Of the staircase outside the east wall only the foundation of the block remains, with the first and second of a series of steps ascending southwards. It stops short before reaching the cross wall, so as not to block the entry into the hall. As the number of steps could hardly have exceeded fourteen, the ascent must have been continued through a curved entry corresponding to and above that below, since the upper floor of the main block was $13\frac{1}{2}$ feet above the ground level.

It has already been stated that the court between the two guest-houses is closed on the south by a continuation of the garderobe wall of the eastern building. This wall turns at a right angle to the corner of the western hall, and thus formed two sides of a small camera, of which the garderobe formed a third. The fourth side has gone, and its position cannot be fixed with certainty, but it must have existed, for the presence of a fireplace in the west wall shows that there was a building here, probably of two stories. What looks like the base of a narrow stair to the upper floor remains against the garderobe. To avoid blocking up the water-channel under the garderobe, the extension west of it is built upon an arched basement.

The west end of the hall was covered by a pentise, as may be seen by the corbels for it. This was closed, at any rate to some height up, at its north end by a wall in which was a doorway. North of it there was probably another pentise covering the free part of the north side of the hall, which has a doorway that might have opened into it. There is also a doorway adjoining this into the north wing. Both doorways have been walled up. The courtyard upon which the pentises opened has evidently been considerably encroached upon by the stream, which here makes a sharp angle before resuming its former direction on the south of the buildings.

Where so much has been destroyed, it is not easy to make out all the arrangements of such a block of buildings, even when the plan seems complete. Probably the two halls were used as such for different classes of guests, and the northern wing of the western building may have served as a kitchen common to both. The upper floors were no doubt used as dormitories.

In later times it is likely that both houses were served from the kitchen attached to the old farmery of the conversi, which was in direct communication with them by the little stone bridge between.

THE LAYFOLKS' INFIRMARY.

Besides the accommodation thus provided for secular visitors to the abbey, there was, as in other Cistercian monasteries, an infirmary where they were lodged when sick. There was certainly an infirmatorium secularium at Pipewell,¹ Meaux, and Waverley,² as well as at Newminster and Furness, where it was called infirmatorium sæculare.³ At Fountains the only documentary reference to it is a somewhat doubtful one as the infirmatorium pauperum,⁴ which may have been a separate building. There are the remains of a building on the north side of the outer court, not far from the north-west angle of the church, which may have formed part of the layfolks' infirmary. Otherwise its site is unknown. The paupers' infirmary was most likely outside the gates.

THE MALTHOUSE AND THE BAKEHOUSE.

The little footbridge between the eastern guest-house and the farmery of the lay brethren leads to the remains of a puzzling group of buildings some way up the bank. They formed roughly a parallelogram about 170 feet long standing north and south, composed of two distinct buildings placed end to end, with a massive rubble wall between. A piece of this wall is the most prominent of the existing remains.

³ See Newminster Chartulary (Surtees Society, 66), xv.; and T. A. Beck, Annales Furnesienses, History and Antiquities of the Abbey of Furness (London, 1844), 128.

The southern block was about 70 feet long and 55 feet wide, but is ruined to its plinths, and traversed by a modern wall and cart-track. Nevertheless it exhibits a number of interesting features. Most of these were disclosed by the excavations of 1888, which were also extended to the bank south of the cart-road. The massive wall above referred to formed the north end; it exists to a height of about 17 feet and for about half its original length. The east wall contained two doorways from without, and was partly overlapped by a building. The lower part of the west wall remains throughout, with the bases of three buttresses. These indicate the subdivision of the block into a main section about 55 feet square and four bays long, with a narrow section on the south forming another bay. The main section was divided by arches and party walls into a central alley 22 feet wide, with an eastern alley about 13 feet wide and a western somewhat wider. The remaining portion of the north wall has a plain stringcourse a few feet up, but at two levels, which are separated by the springer of an arch of the western arcade. Just to the west of the springer is a vertical chase in the wall for a pipe from an upper floor. This pipe seems to have returned westwards along the stringcourse for 10 or 11 feet, then descended by a cut through it. Its course is marked by an extensive deposit of stalagmite along the wall, in places as much as $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches thick. The west wall has at its north end the remains of an ash-shoot, rebated for a shutter, and below it, on the floor level, a small pointed passage through the wall, $12\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide and 17 inches high. This part of the alley retains its paving of stone slabs. Immediately below the springer above noted is the base of a circular hearth, nearly 5 feet in diameter. The opening into it is on the eastern side, in a low wall or counter which extends southwards for $13\frac{1}{2}$ feet and there ends in a half-octagon. This wall is only 39 inches thick, so that the hearth attached to it projects considerably into the alley behind. On the left hand of the furnace-opening is a stone, 10 inches thick, projecting 19 inches into the room. From the half-octagon a wall 14 inches thick extends southwards for $11\frac{1}{2}$ feet. Here it would appear to have abutted against a similar half-octagon, or perhaps an octagonal pier, but all beyond has gone. There exists, however, a line of rough stones from the place of the pier to the west wall. Of the corresponding eastern arcade there only remains at the north end a short fragment of walling, with a chamfered plinth on each side; it unfortunately is broken off just short of the half-pier. Near this wall is a lead pipe in the floor. From the half-pier on the west side there extends nearly across the room the chamfered curb of a platform paved with stone slabs and raised a few inches above the floor north of it; the floor of the west alley is on the same level. It extends southwards under the road, and probably up to the south wall of the building. On the north-west corner of the platform is a stone with a shallow circular sinking with wide drain opening therefrom. In the south-west corner a narrow drain is cut in the floor. The excavations in the bank beyond the modern wall brought to light the foundations of a structure extending across the south end of the block and forming its limit southwards. The western end of this contained a chamber measuring 12 feet by 11 feet, entered by a door in its north front. The central division was recessed back about 3 feet, and contained the remains of a large circular tank, over 18 feet in diameter, built of brickwork and lined with cement. Part of one side was standing to a height of 2 feet. The tank was raised two steps above the level of the platform north of it. The eastern division was apparently an extension of the eastern alley, since it opened into it by its full width. The whole block seems to have had an upper floor 10 feet up. In connection with this was the building already noted as partly covering the east side. This was at least 27 feet long and 22 feet wide, and had a fireplace in the south-east corner and a garderobe in the north-east; it must therefore have contained one or more living-rooms.

As to the use of the building just described, there can be little doubt that the ground floor at any rate was a malthouse. The process of malting as practised in this country in the sixteenth century is quaintly described by William Harrison in his Description of England as follows:

"Our malt is made of the best barleie, which is steeped in a cesterne, in greater or lesse quantitie, by the space of three daies and three nights, untill it be throughlie soked. This being doone, the water is drained from it by little and little, till it be quite gone. Afterward they take it out, and laieng it upon the cleane floore on a round heape, it resteth so untill it be readie to shoote at the root end, which maltsters call Comming. When it beginneth therefore to shoot in this maner, they saie it is come, and then foorthwith they spread it abroad, first thicke, and afterward thinner and thinner upon the said floore (as it commeth), and there it lieth (with turning everie daie foure or five times) by the space of one and twentie daies at the least, the workeman not suffering it in anie wise to take anie heat, whereby the bud end should spire, that bringeth foorth the blade, and by which oversight or hurt of the stuffe it selfe the malt would be spoiled, and turne small commodotie to the bruer. When it hath gone or beene turned so long upon the floore, they carie it to a kill covered with haire cloth, where they give it gentle beats (after they have spread it there verie thin abroad) till it be drie, and in the meane while they turne it often, that it may be uniformelie dried. For the more it be dried (yet must it be doone with soft fire) the sweeter and better the malt is,

and the longer it will continue, etc. In some places it is dried at leisure with wood alone, or strawe alone, in other with wood and strawe together, but of all the strawe dried, is the most excellent."¹

From this description it would appear that the circular tank served as the steeping cistern, and its ruined state may be due to the wrenching out of the leaden pipes by which it was drained. The flagged stone floor would serve excellently to first heap and then spread the steeped barley on, and with the low-roofed hall to keep down the temperature and prevent the malt being spoiled. Lastly, in the furthest corner is the place of the kiln where the malt could be dried under the conditions described by Harrison.

Of the upper floor we can say nothing. Possibly it served as the brewhouse, as well as the malt-store, and not improbably it is to a leaky down-pipe from the boiling vats that we owe the deposit of stalagmite on the wall below.

The malthouse appears in the main to be of late thirteenth century work.

The block to the north of that just described is even more ruined, and its plan and arrangements are not easy to make out. The remnant of the party wall shews on this side a curious four-centered arch of construction; it also has large holes and a corbel for beams some height up. In front of it was a long and narrow passage, paved with stone slabs and closed on the west by a thin wall with a door leading to a porch or pentise outside. At the eastern end, which is nearly all destroyed, against the south wall, are the remains of a fireplace, and lying about are a number of pieces of an ornate chimney which surmounted it. In the middle of the south wall there seems to have been a wide archway, and in it were the openings into two baking ovens, one 6 feet in diameter, the other somewhat less, that stood in the chamber behind. This chamber appears to have been about 20 feet wide and 52 feet long. The central portion was occupied by the ovens, which were domed over, and covered on the south by a broad flight of stone steps. To the west of the oven block is a singular arrangement in the floor, consisting of (1) a semicircular kneading-place [?] built of stone, along the edge of which is a chase for a water-pipe, leading to (2) a long stone trough, also sunk in the floor, with (3) the traces of another kneading-place [?] to the west, at a higher level, in a recess built out for it. There are other equally curious features, which it is difficult to describe intelligibly. To the north of the bake-house proper, to which we may certainly take these arrangements to have belonged, is a large room covering the end of the block, with a long and narrow chamber on the east filling up the rest of the area. There is nothing to shew to what use these, and the upper floor which seems to have surmounted the whole, were put.

The bakehouse is probably the work of Abbot John of Kent, but the thick walls at each end of it appear to belong to the middle of the twelfth century.

From the buildings just described the modern footpath leads in a north-westerly direction to a very perfect and interesting thirteenth century bridge crossing the stream. It was evidently the work of Abbot John of Kent, and is of two spans, with wide pointed arches, each wrought with five chamfered ribs on the under side. The parapet rises on both sides from a stringcourse studded with notch-heads, and is for the most part original; but the central portions which projected with the central dividing pier have been rebuilt in line with the rest of the parapet. The walls here lining the beck are contemporary with the bridge.

THE GREAT GATEHOUSE.

From the north-east angle of the bridge there remains underground the foundations of an old wall, between 2 and 3 feet thick, which extended northwards for about 100 feet as far as the gatehouse or principal entrance to the abbey.

This gatehouse stood due west of and directly opposite to the west front of the church, from which it was distant about 360 feet. Unfortunately it has been almost entirely destroyed, and part of the north wall of the gate passage and a fragment of its south side are the only remains of it above ground. The excavations of 1888 disclosed the bases of the piers and the lower parts of sundry doorways, etc. now buried, and from these and other features it has been possible to recover most of the ground plan. (Fig. 27.)

The passage consisted of two parts: (1) an outer porch, $28\frac{1}{2}$ feet long, and $23\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide, with an entrance archway almost as wide, and vaulted in two bays; and (2) the gate hall, which though of the same width was but $12\frac{1}{2}$ feet long and vaulted in one bay only. Between the two was the gateway proper, consisting of a wide arch with double doors for the passage of vehicles, and a doorway on one side for foot passengers. The outer jambs of these remain underground, as shewn on the plan. The dividing pier could not be searched for. The gate hall had an open archway to the court like that into the porch at the opposite end, and both were carried by simple piers with re-entering angles. The gate arches had plain moulded jambs. On the north side of the gate hall are traces of a doorway, but there is nothing to show into what it opened, and a buttress remaining outside opposite the middle line of the porch makes it doubtful whether any buildings existed on this side. In the south wall is another doorway. This opened into a chamber overlapping the passage and vaulted in two bays; it was no doubt the porter's lodge (cella portarii). West of it, and probably divided from it by a partition, was another chamber, of one bay, and apparently vaulted at a higher level, which had an entrance doorway from the porch. The wall-ribs to the vaults show that there was an upper floor to the gatehouse, but how it was reached is not now evident, unless the blocked doorway on the north of the gate hall led to an external staircase there.

The whole of the remains of the gatehouse belong to the earlier half of the thirteenth century.

About 13 feet to the west of the chambers flanking the gatehouse is the base of a contemporary wall with buttresses and moulded plinth. This seems to have belonged to a vaulted passage of two bays attached to the gatehouse and leading southwards from the open space before it to the bridge, and so on to the malthouse and other buildings in that direction. It was no doubt closed by gates.

From the north-west corner of this passage a wall extended westwards for about 135 feet to where there still stands the west wall of a twelfth century building containing a small round-headed window.

This building stood east and west, and there can be very little doubt that it was the capella extra portas, where women and other persons who were not allowed within the gates could hear mass, etc. This chapel without the gates is still standing at Rievaulx and Furness, and also at Coggleshall, where it has lately been repaired and again used for the services of the Church. That at Croxden, of the thirteenth century, was destroyed so recently as 1884.¹ References to that at Meaux occur early in the fourteenth century, which shew that it was of older date.

On the opposite side of the roadway there begins at the north-west corner of the gatehouse a stout stone wall, which serves as a retaining wall to the rapidly-rising ground behind and extends westwards in an oblique direction for some 200 feet. At intervals along it are inserted corbels for a pentise, which no doubt served as a convenient shelter for carts, etc. during fairs and at other times.

THE MILL.

To the west of all the other buildings of the abbey, and directly south of the remains of the chapel without the gate, but on the other side of the river, is the abbey mill. It stands nearly north and south, athwart the course of the mill-race, which has been formed by diverting a portion of the main stream by a weir built across it some 600 feet to the west.

The mill is a long three-storied building, measuring $23\frac{1}{2}$ feet in width internally. It was originally at least 100 feet in length, but the north end has been destroyed and a modern structure of smaller dimensions than the old work built on its site.

Unlike the other buildings that have been described, the mill retains its roof and floors, and is still in working order; the northern half being used as of old as a corn mill, and the southern end as the saw mill of the Studley Royal estate. Originally there was but one wheel, in the centre of the building, but since the Suppression another has been added outside on the south-west.

The mill is mostly of the thirteenth century, but on the east side there remain parts of a structure anterior to the fire of 1147, with some later alterations. The east side is divided by added thirteenth century buttresses into five unequal bays. The northernmost retains the jamb of a window on its broken end, and has also a wide segmental-headed doorway, now partly built up. This and the wall in which it is set are of the oldest date; the upper part is ruined. The next bay is thirteenth century work, and contains a window in every story. Throughout the mill the windows of this date are coupled lancets, with dividing mullions, and depressed heads, each cut out of a single stone. The third bay is narrower than the others and has a thirteenth century window on the second floor, but the basement story is of the first work, with a window of that date. This has, however, been blocked and partly destroyed to make way for a round-headed archway, also now blocked, over the waterway from the mill wheel. The fourth bay has a segmental-headed doorway, of the first period, into the basement, but the work above is thirteenth century with a window on each floor. The southernmost bay is much wider than the rest, and is partly covered by two modern structures. It has a twelfth century doorway into the basement, and two others on the first floor, one of the twelfth, the other of the thirteenth century. Above are two windows, also of the latter date. These have across them the mark of the low-pitched roof of some building that once abutted against this bay. The south end has two square windows opening into the basement, and a doorway and window on the first floor. The former is Norman, the latter thirteenth century. The gable is apparently post-Suppression. The west side is throughout of the thirteenth century. It is divided by buttresses into four unequal bays, but of the northernmost only part remains. The basement is on this side covered by the mill dam. The first floor contains a series of square-headed windows of two lights, but they have lost their mullions. They seem to be late sixteenth century work. The uppermost floor has an original window in each bay.

Internally the basement is divided about midway by the water wheel, an undershot one which works four mill stones placed to the north of it on the floor above. The fittings and subdivisions of this floor, as well as the basement, are all post-Suppression or modern. The second floor seems to have been divided into two large store-places by a wall carried up from the south side of the wheel, but the southern end has been subdivided by a wall containing a fireplace and by various partitions. All these alterations, as well as the existing roof, are probably of late sixteenth or early seventeenth century work, as suggested by Mr. J. A. Reeve.¹

THE ABBEY PRECINCT.

The whole of the abbey precinct was enclosed, as shewn on the accompanying plan, by a massive wall, most of which, except on the north, where it has been removed, remains in fairly good condition. It was pierced by several postern gates, and where the roadway passed through it on the west up to the great or inner gatehouse, there seems to have been an outer gatehouse. Any traces of this that might have existed were probably obliterated when Fountains Hall was built and the ground around it laid out as gardens; but an interesting document which has been printed by Mr. Walbran apparently refers to it, and gives us other information concerning buildings in this direction. This is an indenture made on 20th February, 3 Henry VIII. (1511-12), between Abbot Marmaduke (Huby) and the Convent of Fountains, and Robert Dawson and Ellen his wife, demising to the said Robert and Ellen a house or hospice outside the west gates of the monastery, newly founded and built, with a little close adjoining, also the enclosure called "Gest stabyll ynge," etc. Among other services to be performed in return by the grantees it was provided that the said Robert shall diligently attend and faithfully fulfil the office of porter at the west gates of the monastery, and shall nightly keep them closed in times of fairs and other seasons, or cause it to be done, at fitting and convenient hours. Ellen Dawson was to wash or cause to be washed well and diligently all the sheets belonging ad aulam promptuarium, hospicium commune, et ad cameram domini Abbatis, whenever it should be necessary. Robert and Ellen were further to build, as soon as they conveniently could, at their own costs, a fitting and convenient stable beside the house or hospice abovesaid, for the use of themselves and their guests, whom Robert promised to receive and take care of. Ellen Dawson survived her husband, and in 1526 accounted amongst other things pro novo hospicio extra novas portas. As the remains of the inner gatehouse show that it was a building of the twelfth century, the "new gates" for the safe keeping of which the Dawsons were responsible must have been an outer gatehouse, no doubt one of the works of Abbot Huby.¹ The guesthouse under their care would be the "casual ward" for tramps.

The writer cannot conclude this paper without expressing his indebtedness to the Marquess of Ripon for the facilities so freely and so kindly granted him in his researches. He has also to thank Mr. Thomas Mason, of Fountains Hall, for much useful help during the excavations, and Mr. J. T. Micklethwaite, Mr. J. Arthur Reeve, and Mr. Harold Brakspear for their valuable co-operation and information during the preparation and publication of the foregoing account of Fountains Abbey.

P.S.—The foregoing account of Fountains Abbey should more properly have begun with the precinct and gatehouses, and then have described the buildings; first in the outer court, next those round the cloister, ending with the abbot's lodging and the monks' infirmary. As, however, most visitors to the Abbey approach it from the east, it has been thought more convenient to begin with the church, and after proceeding round its north side to take the other buildings in order from east to west as they stand in the valley. This paper can thus be made to serve as a handbook to the ruins.

once and again in the conveyances I have mentioned, and in these various forms—Masthills, Great Mastill, Little Mastill, and Maskills. I daresay some of the visitors to Whitby will at once call to mind that this same name is met with very near to Sandsend. On sheet 32 of the six-inch Ordnance Survey it is found in the form Mast Hill, as the distinguishing name of the hilly slope which is bordered by the “brant bank,” or laboriously steep bit of road running up from Sandsend to Lythe, just below the roadway or “drive” running from the Lodge to Mulgrave Castle.

This “Mast Hill,” which rises from the sea level at Sandsend to 240 feet above it at the Lodge just named, is what is spoken of by Charlton at page 2, as follows:—“There is in its neighbourhood (that of Dunsley Bay, namely) a certain dale called to this day Mars-Dale, from a grove that seems to have been planted there, and consecrated to the god Mars, &c.” And if anyone wishes to see more of this sort of hallucination, he should turn to page 65, where he will find the “god Mars” supplanted by the “heathen god Thor.”

Discarding further notice of this equally unwarranted and fallacious transformation of Masthill into Mars-dale, let us return to the actual and veritable form Mast Hill, or rather Mast-hill. Of course, I have heard of the mythic “mast” set up on the hill in question; and of course I dismissed it with the scant ceremony due to fables of that sort. But all the same I had no more reasonable explanation to substitute in its place. There was the name; and I was content to believe that eventually some correct, because reasonable and historical, solution would be found for the puzzle.

I am now inclined to think that the solution of the difficulty has suggested itself; although I am obliged to speak on the matter with some qualification or reserve. But the suggestion originated in the following way. Some months ago I was looking over one of the papers contributed by Canon Isaac Taylor, on occasion of what was called “The Domesday Commemoration,” which papers are published in the two volumes entitled “Domesday Studies.” And in the former of these volumes, at page 64, I read,—“A neighbouring Rector . . . also possesses an acre allotted to him in lieu of the right of tethering two horses on the balks and ‘marstalls’ of the Common field.” The word “Marstalls” immediately arrested my attention, and I saw at once how easy the transition in sound from marstall to masthill really was. I naturally recurred, in memory, to the Sandsend Masthill, and from that to the Masthills, Mastill, Maskills of the Danby conveyances: the last word, Maskills, being an obvious phonetic variation of Mastills. The word “marstall” occurs in what Canon Taylor speaks of as “an Elizabethan document”; so that, therefore, it is more than half a century older than our Danby names, which are met with in documents dated in 1656. It will also be noted that the marstalls are spoken of in close association with balks; although it is quite clear that there is a distinction—not to say a difference—between the one and the other. A “balk” is not the same thing as a “marstall”; and the connection between them arises from the fact that both of them were such that they might afford pasturage for a horse or horses.

There is a difference, more than a distinction, of meaning involved in the two terms or words. The ordinary “balk” is the unploughed strip of land lying between, or separating, the lands of two different occupants. These balks are usually narrow, often not exceeding two, or at most, three feet in width. The widest I have ever seen remaining to this day hardly exceeded six to seven feet in breadth, and they had accumulated in progress of time. The balks and marstalls on the Kirkby Underdale glebe, on the contrary, were spacious enough to allow of horses being tethered on them. But “tethering” a horse, or any other animal, involves the consideration of the “length of the tether.” A tether or tether-rope of six to eight feet only of length exacts a circular space of twelve to sixteen feet of pasturable grass, and a horse-tether of that length is not great enough for the needs of a horse unless the pasturage is very copious. This consideration precludes the idea that the balks meant are merely the narrow partition ridges between “land” and “land”—between one man’s holding and another man’s holding. Something far more spacious than they, or such as they, must be intended.

Now here I ask attention to the following extract from Mr. Robert Turton’s Continuation of the Publications of the “North Riding Record Society,” vol. 1, page 31:—“To the seaventhe article they (the Jurors) presente that there are in the lordship of Pickeringe certain Baulks beinge the outboundes of his highnes flats, now in the occupation of severall tennantes in Pickeringe, whoe having divided the sayde landes amongste them, have been contented that one balke called Burne moare Balke, Hallie Thorne balke, and Stint Thorne Balke be used for the highwaye for the inhabitantes for leading home their corne and haye.” At page 66 we have further mention of “Stint thorn baulk and of Hallythorn baulke,” and in such a way that it is evident that there was an areal space of upwards of an acre involved. Considerable breadth must also of necessity be inferred from the fact that these baulkes were made to serve as highways for the leading of corn and hay over.

Taking these circumstances into consideration, we are in a better position for considering also the fact that these baulkes are described as being the "outboundes of his highness' flatts." From page 66 it is further apparent that Stint-thorne baulke was the northern "out-bound," and Hallythorne baulke the southern boundary of the space of cultivable land designated by the term "flatts." This term is of perpetual occurrence in ancient deeds which deal with agricultural land, in what we may term an areal connection. Thus we meet with it no less than eighteen times in one document, printed in the Whitby Chartulary, vol. I, page 328, the subject matter of which is the arable land possessed by the convent in the parish of Skirpenbeck; and "his Highness" Charles, Prince of Wales in 1619, afterwards (King Charles the First) like other great Lords, then, and much more in previous times, held many and diverse lands in his lordships or possessions, and some of these lands and lordships were situate in Pickering Lythe. Necessarily they were bounded, as well as divided into several strips, and the boundary banks or balks were of considerable dimensions. These banks, baulkes, "outboundes," high, wide and massive, were what I take to have been what in divers places were called "Marstalls."

But still I have got to try and show that this idea of mine is not inconsistent with, or contradictory to, philological considerations. When my attention was first specially directed to the matter, the first step I took on meeting with this word "marstall," in the way mentioned, was to write to Canon Taylor a note of enquiry. In reply I got the following from him:—"The word 'marstalls' occurs on the glebe of Kirby Underdale. You will find the explanation in Kluge, page 21:—"Marstall, aus M. H. G. marstall = pferdestall, fur Marstal, as M. H. G. Mare-schale for Marh-schale," and in yet a later note, "I referred to the German word only as an analogy. I take the syllable mar as meaning horse as in marshall, the feminine being mare; A.S. mare being feminine of marh a horse. The syllable stall is simply a place or station. In these parts it is common to tether ass or horse by a rope to a post. The beast eats a circular patch of grass, which is the marstall." I must at once admit that this definition (rather than explanation) of marstall was by no means satisfactory to me: for it was entirely irreconcilable with the obvious intention of the expression, "in lieu of the right of tethering two horses on the balks and marstalls of the common field." And besides that, it was an English not a German derivation or origin I wanted to meet with. As to stall and its meaning there could be no doubt. As to mar I thought there was every doubt. Not that I questioned the derivation of our English word "marshall." That is right beyond dispute. But it seemed to me that mar ought to be as English as stal itself, and I thought our North country mere—a boundary, a boundary mark, which, as I knew well, often takes the form mar (especially in compound names), would serve the required purpose. Thus I had long been familiar with the names Marmothow, Mermetthorne, occurring about 1325 near Leyburn; Cheesemar (the name of a boundary mark); Marmedland, another like name; Scarmarwath, a third from the same document (Continuation of North Riding Records, page 24), and a host of others like. These all had to do with boundaries, “outboundes,” and seemed capable of collation with marstall in the sense that seemed to me to suggest itself as at the least not unlikely. And if I had needed further confirmation, I surely had it in the analogy afforded by the Wykeham Markemode, Markmode, Markemot, Markmot, about which I wrote in my “Philological Preface” to Mr. Turton’s first volume of Continuation, “I succeeded, I thought, in identifying the ‘locus qui dicitur Markemod’ with a field which is still called Markhams; which field, noteworthily, is to this day partly in Wykeham and partly in Brompton. In other words the boundaries, mearks, marks or marches, meres, of the two townships named fall together or meet—have their meeting or mot—in this enclosure. It literally designated a markmote.” And I added that, in former times, the boundary between parish and parish had in this northern district been termed the “march.” Later the equivalent term had become mere, mer, or mar; so that the recognition of Marmothow, Mermetthorne, Marmedland, became as evident as it was simple. That same mar or mer, I think, is the mar in our “Marstall,” slightly altered phonetically into Masthill or Mastill, or Maskills. My next step was to submit my theory to two of my philological friends, Professor Skeat and Mr. Henry Bradley. They both wrote me word that they failed to find any trace of the existence of the O.E. Mærsteall; the one of them writing in addition, “The suggestion which you make is highly probable. There is not only mere-stone, but mere-staff, mere-tree, and mere-stake, all from mere-boundary, which often occurs as the first part of a compound word; and the A.S. steall, a stall, often appears as the latter part of a compound. So the compound is very likely.” This was Professor Skeat. Mr. Bradley wrote, “Mærsteall would certainly be an admissible formation to express the sense ‘place where boundary marks might be put’; and I do not see how the ‘balks or marstalls’ of your quotation can be explained otherwise. So I think you must be right. Though it would have been more satisfactory if an actual instance in Old English could have been found.” Thus then, on the whole, I think our old local or field-name, “Masthills,” admits of easy and reasonable explanation.

ACCOUNT ROLL OF SELBY ABBEY,

THIS portion of a roll of accounts of Selby Abbey, with many others also for a great part imperfect, is the property of the earl of Londesborough, the lord of the manor of Selby, who has kindly placed it, with others, at the disposal of this Society.

The commencement of the roll containing the date is wanting, but a notice of the intended duel between the dukes of Hereford and Norfolk gives the date, as that event took place at Coventry on Sept. 16th, 1398. If other witness were wanting, the mention of these dukes and of the duke of Albemarle or Aumâle, who were all raised to the dignity of a duke on Sept. 29th in the previous year, would give a clue. As Albemarle was deprived of his dukedom on Oct. 29th, 1399, it cannot be later than that time. The entries in the roll are arranged in chronological order. The earliest date is St. Thomas's Day, Dec. 21st, which from the context must have been in the year 1397, and the latest Oct. 28th in the next year. All these dates occur on the recto.¹

The entries on this side of the roll are arranged in three sections. The first, which has lost its heading and is otherwise imperfect, contains the payments to servants, as a scullery lad and a man employed in cleaning out a dam. The second section, which is complete, is headed dona, and gives a list of the presents made by the abbot during a period which is uncertain, as the earlier part of the section is imperfect. The latest entry is St. Simon and St. Jude's Day, Oct. 28th, so it probably commenced at the next important feast-day, which was All Souls' Day, on the 1st of November. The last section contains an account of the monies paid for the abbot's personal expenses.

The first section is so brief and imperfect that it calls for no special notice, but the list of presents which follows is worthy of careful consideration. Besides presents of money made to officials, such as the archbishop's registrar and persons visiting churches belonging to the abbey, with whom it was advisable for the abbot to be on friendly terms, most of the money was given to messengers bringing letters or presents to the abbot. As might be expected from his high position as a mitred abbot, the only rival north of the Trent being the head of the other great Benedictine house of St. Mary's, York, the names of many of the noblest and most influential personages of the times occur amongst his correspondents. When we go through the list, time-honoured Lancaster, Harry of Hereford, shortly afterwards king of England, Norfolk, Albemarle, Shakespeare's Aumerle, archbishop Scroope, Northumberland, Roos, called Ross by Shakespeare, and Gascoigne, who was not raised to the bench till a couple of years later, we seem to be reading a commentary on Shakespeare's "Richard II." This roll entirely confirms Shakespeare's historic insight in making this duel between the two dukes one of the most prominent incidents in his drama. The interest throughout the country must have been intense. Two special messengers were sent to Selby to convey the tidings, one from bishop Skirlaugh of Durham, and the other from the duchess of Lancaster, possibly not very friendly to Hereford, as she was Hereford's step-mother, and before her marriage had been very inferior in rank to her husband.

All the presents, except a couple of sporting dogs from Lady Roos, were articles of food. There is only one stag (bissus) mentioned, but the abbot would be amply supplied from his own park at Selby. Partridges from Tadcaster, fowls (volatilia) from Kirk Bramwith, and a swan from Crowle, occur among the things sent. Fish, as might be expected, occurs more than once. The main supply was kept in the Vevers at Selby, but additions arrived from lower down the Ouse and from Lincolnshire. Eels were sent from Crowle, lampreys from Hook, and about St. Thomas's Day, in preparation for the Christmas festivities, three cartloads of fish from Stallingburgh. Cakes, here called wafers, now gaufres,¹ were brought from Beverley. The archbishop's wafrarius once received a present, but this may have been for the purpose of securing his good offices with his master, and not for his services in making cakes.

Whilst providing for the body the mind was not neglected. Entertainments such as were provided for the amusement of the abbot of Selby must have been in Chaucer's mind when he says in the Canterbury Tales (Group C., ll. 477-479):—

And ryght anon than comen tombesteres
Fetys and smale, and yongè fruyteteres,
Singers with harpès[EEK, and] wafereres.

a biscuit, so thin as to be almost transparent, and as the word wafer implies, pitted like a piece of honeycomb.

Except that at Selby the tumblers or dancers, however fetys or well-made, as well as the fruit-sellers, would be men. Minstrels were constantly made welcome. The minstrel was a great deal more than a performer on musical instruments. He was a conjuror, story-teller, and much more of a like nature, and in fact provided an entertainment very much resembling in its nature that found in the music halls. Eighteen minstrels in all received presents. Even the worst, such as Huburdouncey, pessimus ministrallus, was not sent away unrewarded. Two minstrels came at Christmas from Selby, but most of them were members of wandering troupes, travelling about the country under the protection of some great man's name, such as the dukes of Albemarle, Lancaster, Norfolk, the earl of Northumberland, and others. The actors in Tudor and Stuart times performed their plays under similar conditions, and we hear of the Lord Chamberlain's company, the Lord Admiral's company, the Lord Strange's company, or of many other influential noblemen. The play which was performed before the abbot on St. John Baptist's Day by clerks from Selby, was no doubt a miracle play.

The festivals of St. German, the patron saint of the abbey, were celebrated with great ceremony. At the feast of his death (transitus), on the last day of July, seven clerks were brought from York to play the organ, and the services of a harp-player were secured, and at the feast of his deposition, in October, the York clerks attended again. The most curious payment of all is one of eightpence to John of Sutton, the abbot's flatterer, as this is the only way the word *adulator*¹ can be translated. Possibly he answered to the ordinary jester.

The abbot's personal expenses do not call for much notice. A large sum, 4*li.* 13*s.* 2*d.*, was spent by the abbot whilst attending the convocation and synod in York at Michaelmas. Green ginger and other spices not named, capons (4*d.* each), sturgeons from York, eels, both fresh and salted, lampreys and olive oil, were amongst the eatables purchased, in addition to a sum of 16*li.* 8*s.* 9*d.* spent for the same object, the items of which were given on a separate piece of paper. The abbot's clothing was costly. On his hood alone 15*s.* were expended, besides 16*d.* for silk to sew it with. A considerable quantity of blackcloth, blankets, and linen was purchased for making his clothes. Part of these consisted of fur, so the services of a furrier (pelliparius) had to be called in to put the fur in repair. His table was covered with canvas, and for lights, besides pricketts and torches, he had Paris candles, costing 16*d.* a stone.

The dorse of the rolls contains entries chiefly about rents which could not be recovered. Poverty was the commonest reason, but other causes, sometimes curious, are alleged. A tenant at Crowle had 13s. 4d. given him to console him for the loss he had been put to in prosecuting a thief at Lincoln, and another tenant at Haldanby had 6s., because his land had been much trespassed on by the servants and cattle of the squire. In a certain number of cases the tenant either would not (non vult) or refused (recusat) to pay his rent, probably for good reasons, as many of those refusing to pay were persons of rank, as the abbot of Leicester, Sir John Metham and John Aske. The hedesilver, some kind of poll-tax, could not be levied at Queeniborough, in Leicestershire. This may have been one of the consequences of Jack Straw's rebellion in 1381. There are a few items about repairs to the houses of the tenants, but of no particular interest. The lord furnished the main timbers (grossum meremium), which were of ash. The roll on this side terminates with the sum total, but as we are ignorant of the items, it is impossible to draw any deductions.

7 Ric. II., No. 68) was taken at Erpyng-hethe, co. Essex, in July, 1384. He died on June 8th previous. John de Roos, "chivaler," son of Thomas and Beatrice, and heir of Thomas, was aged eighteen on St. Lawrence's Day last past (Aug. 10th, 1383). The son died at Paphos in the island of Cyprus, in 1393, without issue.

² John of Gaunt's third wife, Catherine, daughter of Sir Payne Roet, Guienne King-at-Arms, and widow of Sir Hugh de Swynford, knight. Their marriage took place in January, 1397. She survived her husband and died on May 10th, 1403.

³ Probably Sir Thomas Gray, of Heton, in Northumberland, who was in the service of Henry IV. from his arrival in England till his coronation. On May 24th, 1400, he had a general pardon as a consolation for the losses the Scots had inflicted on his property at Wark, estimated at 2,000 marks, besides having to pay a ransom of a thousand pounds for his children and servants. The destruction was very considerable, all his goods taken away, the houses burnt, and the castle walls cast down (Patent Roll, 1 Hen. IV., part vii., m. 28). His inquisition was taken at Morpeth on Tuesday after Trinity, 2 Hen. IV. (May 31st, 1401). He died seised in fee tail with his wife Joan, who survived him, of the castle of Wark, held in chief and worth nothing on account of the destruction of the Scotch. Also of a messuage and 16 acres of land, called Straideland, lying within the field of Bawmburght (Bamborough), for which the tenants were wont to make irons for the ploughs (ferra pro aratris) at the castle of Bamburght. AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF
BARON OF THE EXCHEQUER, 1546-1607.

EDITED BY J. W. CLAY, F.S.A., AND JOHN LISTER, M.A.

THIS autobiography, the original of which is in the Phillipps Library, formerly at Cheltenham, has been copied and translated from the Latin by Mr. John Lister, M.A., Shibden Hall, Halifax.

Sir John Savile was the eldest of an illustrious trio of brothers who went up to Oxford in the second half of the sixteenth century from Bradley in Elland. Sir Henry Savile, the second brother, was the celebrated scholar and the publisher of the works of St. Chrysostom. He was Warden of Merton College, Oxford, Provost of Eton, and founder of the Savilian professorships of Astronomy and Geometry at Oxford. Mr. Joseph Hunter calls him the most eminent man the West Riding has produced. He died in 1622.

Thomas the youngest was fellow of Merton, and Proctor. He was one of the most learned men at Oxford, but died early in 1592, and was buried in Merton College Chapel.

Sir John, the author of this autobiography, was as there stated born in 1546, educated at Brazennose College, Oxford, and became Sergeant-at-Law in 1594, and Baron of the Exchequer in 1598. He bought Methley, and rebuilt the house, but did not live long to enjoy it, dying in 1606-7. He was buried in the church of St. Dunstan's, Fleet Street, but his heart was taken to Methley Church, where there is a handsome monument to his memory.

Sir Henry Savile, his eldest son of his first wife, was created a baronet in 1611, but his sons dying without issue the estates passed to his half-brother John, ancestor of the Earls of Mexborough, who still possess Methley.

This autobiography, except for the genealogical notices, contains little of value. The Baron wrote it down in as jejune and dry a manner as he reported the cases in the courts of the Exchequer and Common Pleas. No personal feeling is displayed, and even the deaths of his numerous wives seem to have had little effect on him.

At all events he speedily repaired his losses. The brief mention of the books he read before going up to Oxford is not without interest. Shakespeare, who was twenty years his junior, probably read the same authors at the Stratford-on-Avon Grammar School. Many of these are still popular, Æsop, Virgil, Horace, Ovid and Cicero; but Cato's Disticha Moralia, Castalion's Sacred Dialogues, and Eutropius's History have long passed away into the limbo of forgotten things. Previous to going to the University his education seems to have been entrusted to private tutors in the neighbourhood, some or all of whom were in holy orders. Possibly this was in consequence of the disorganization of the ancient grammar-schools, owing to the predatory legislation of Edward the Sixth's advisers.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

JOHN SAVILE, firstborn son and heir of Henry Savile, of Over-Bradley, in Stainland, near Elande, within the vicarage of Halifax, county and diocese of York, gentleman, and Bachelor of Common and Civil Law, and of Elizabeth, daughter of Robert Ramesden, was born on March 26th, 1546, 37 Henry VIII.¹ His father, Henry, was the second son of John Savile,² of Newhall, near Elande, in the county aforesaid, the first-born son of Nicholas Savile, of Newhall aforesaid, who built the same hall, and who was the younger son of T[homas] S[avile], of Hollingedge,³ who was the second son of H[enry] S[avile], of Copley, esq., and of Helen, daughter and heiress of T[homas] de Copley. And Henry Savile was the younger son of Henry Savile, of Thornhill, brother of John Savile, knight, and cousin and heir of Isabel Savile, the sister and heiress of John Savile, who was the son and heir of the aforesaid John Savile, knight, who was the son of John Savile, knight, who was the son of John Savile and of Margaret, his wife, the daughter of Henry de Ryshworth.

In the time of Edward VI. he learned the Alphabet and English Catechism under Richard and Hugh Gledhill, clerk [ædituo]⁴ and curate of Eland, and at Huddersfield under one Golding, a Westmoreland man, and Bachelor of Arts.

⁴ A word of doubtful meaning. Cooper in his Latin Dictionary s.v. interprets it: "The prelate of the temple or church, the parson, the sexton; of some it is taken for a clerke" (Thesaurus Lingua Romana et Britannica etc. opera et in- dustria Thomæ Cooperi Magdalanensis. Impressum Londini, 1584). Adam Lyttelton (temp. Car. ii.) gives the word ædituus as meaning "churchwarden," also "sexton." Fabricator or Fabricerius seem to have been the words favoured in the Wakefield Court Rolls in medieval times, to signify churchwarden, and Ducange represents it as meaning "ædis sacræ procurator," "ædituus." As Sir John Savile wrote in the Renaissance days, he would prefer ædituus to fabricator or fabricerius.

Towards the end of the reign of Edward VI. he learned the Accidents, partly at Elland, partly at Rastrick, under Robert Ramesden.¹

In the first year of Mary he read through part of Æsop's Fables, under the aforesaid Richard Gledhill, at Elland. In the second year of Mary, part of the Sacred Dialogues of Castalion,² under Robert Hutton, at Halifax, and in the third year of Mary, he read the Disticha Moralia of Cato,³ at Huddersfield, and partly at Okes Farm, near Almondbury, under the aforesaid Robert Ramsden.

During the fourth and fifth years (1557-8) of Queen Mary, he read at Newhall and the then mansion house of John Nicoll, at the Owldearthside and Aundley,⁴ in the territory of Eland aforesaid, under John Henshowe, clerk, reading Virgil through and the grammatical rules. He spent the rest of Mary's time, and a quarter of the first year of the most clement Queen Elizabeth (1558), at Rastrick, reading Terence under the last afore-mentioned Robert Ramesden.

The remainder of the first year, the second, and until the beginning of March in the third year of Elizabeth (1561), he spent at Halifax, under Richard Best, in reading the Metamorphoses of Ovid, Virgil, Horace, the Epistolæ Familiares, Amicitia and Senectus of Cicero, and the History of Eutropius.

On the 20th day of March, in the third year of Queen Elizabeth (1560-1), he was admitted by his father's order (ex mandato patris sui) to Brazenose College, Oxford, where after two years he became a general sophister,⁵ and obtained his licence for the degree of Bachelor.

² Sebastien Castalion, whose real name was Châteillon, a learned Frenchman of the 16th century and a well-known translator of the Bible, was born in 1515 at Châtillon-les-Dombes, Bresse, and died at Bâle, Dec. 29, 1563. He joined the Reformers and went to Geneva as a friend of Calvin, but was obliged to leave in consequence of his liberal views. In 1545 he had printed at Bâle "Dialogi de sacris literis," or Conversations on Sacred History for the use of Children. This work was reprinted six times at Bâle, three times in London (the last time in 1743), twice at Edinburgh, and four times in Germany. Castalion published the entire bible, "Biblia Sacra Latina," preceded by a noble preface addressed to Edward VI., in which he gave vent to his indignation against persecutions in the name of religion. After the execution of Servetus he wrote a pamphlet, "De Hæreticis an sint persequendi," printed at Magdeburg in 1554, preceded by a dedicatory epistle to Duke Christopher of Wurtemberg, where is found this characteristic sentence: "I have long sought a man who is called an heretic, and this is what I have found, It is a man who thinks differently from us on the subject of religion." Montaigne said of him, "Très excellent personnage, mort de n'avoir pas son saoul à manger" (La Grande Encyclopedie, Paris, s.d. ix. 748).

In the fifth year of Elizabeth, on account of the plague¹ which was imminent there, without having taken his degree he returned to Bradley, his paternal home, where he remained the rest of the fifth year, and nearly all the sixth, under his father's care, on account of the plague which was then severely raging at London, where he read through, once and again, Littleton's Tenures, Ancient and Modern, the Natura Brevium, John Parkin's book and the Statutes, both Magna Charta and Rastall's Abbreviamenta, and the Year Books of Richard III., Henry VII. and Henry VIII.

Sent up to London, when the plague ceased to rage so severely there, he went on All Souls' Day (Nov. 2) to Clement's Inn, and on the 6th Oct. of the same year was admitted thereto, where he remained until the 14th day of February, in the 7th year (1564-5), on which day he was admitted into the Society of the Middle Temple by Edmund Plowden, then Treasurer of the same, and the other Masters of the Bench of the same Temple.

On Oct. 11, 8 Elizabeth (1566) his father, Henry Savile, departed this life. On May 8, 14 Eliz. (1572), he was chosen a Burgess of Parliament for the Borough of Makersfeilde (Macclesfield), in the county of Lancaster, for which Borough he continued Burgess, in the Sessions of the said Parliament, during the aforesaid 14th year, and in the years 18 and 23 years of Queen Elizabeth.

On Feb. 7, 15 Eliz. (1572-3), he was co-opted into the number of the Utter Barristers of the Middle Temple, together with John Sherley, etc., by John Popham, esq., Reader, at his second lecture on the Statutes 32 and 34 Henry VIII.,² on Wills of lands and tenements.

In the months of July and August, 16 Elizabeth (1574), he first practised in the northern circuit before R. Harper³ and Christopher Wraie, Justices of Assize.

On April 11, 17 Elizabeth (1575), he took unto wife, Jane, only daughter of Richard Garthe, esq., at Murdon,⁴ in the county of Surrey, Alexander Nowell, of the Church of St. Paul, London, celebrating the marriage, and, at the same time, preaching on a portion [of scripture] taken from the second lesson of the same day's evensong, to wit, "Marriage is honourable amongst all: but whoremongers and adulterers God shall judge, etc."⁵

In the nineteenth year he was appointed Custos of the Peace, in the county of Durham, and the Liberties of Edwin, archbishop of York, and Ecclesiastical Commissioner for the diocese of Durham.

On the Tuesday of Lent [Die Martis Carnisprivii]¹ being Feb. 19, 1576(-7), 19 Elizabeth, Elizabeth Savile, his eldest daughter, was born, between the twelfth and the first hour in the morning, in the Upper Chamber, next Chauncerie Lane, in the house of the said Richard Garthe, her grandfather, who was godfather for her at the holy font, together with the wife of William Fleetwoodde, Recorder of London, and the wife of Robert Brigge, of the Middle Temple, and in the same year, in the month of July, the same Jane first began her journey to Bradley.

At the same place, in the twenty-first year of Queen Elizabeth, 1579, on the first day of Michaelmas Term, was born Henry,² his eldest living son. Sponsors, William Cordell, knight, Master of the Rolls, and Henry Gate, knight, and the wife of Robert Mounson, one of the Justices of the Common Bench.

In the summer of 22 Elizabeth (1580), the new house at Bradley was for the first time inhabited by the said John and Jane, and in the 23 Elizabeth he was appointed Custos of the Peace in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and a Justice of Oyer and Terminer for the whole of the northern circuit, except the county of Lancaster, and, in the same year, he and his wife journeyed to Newcastle.

In the autumn of the 24th year, he was appointed a commissioner for taxing the Subsidy in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and in the same year they journeyed to London after Easter, and there remained until the end of Trinity Term.

In the twenty-fifth of Elizabeth, 1582(-3), on the Saturday of Lent, Feb. 9, was born, at Bradley, Jane,³ his second daughter, in the chamber of the new work, called "Neville Chamber," John Kaye, of Woodsome, esq., Elizabeth, the wife of John Blithe, and Elizabeth, grandmother of the said Jane, being sponsors, and she [Jane] was the first child born in the same new buildings.

In the month of April, in the twenty-seventh year (1585), they both journeyed to London, on account of the health of the said Jane the wife, where they remained until the end of Trinity Term.

At Michaelmas, at the close of the 27th year, he was elected Reader of the Middle Temple, and began his reading on Aug. 1, 28 Eliz. (1586), on the first Statute of Edward VI., concerning the Dissolution of Colleges,⁴ dividing the Statute into fifteen readings, which he completed, by God's favour, on Wednesday, the sixteenth of the same month.

The words of the same Jane, very frequently repeated two days before her death, were from the eleventh verse of the 84th Psalm of David:—I had rather be a doorekeeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tentes of ungodlines.

The same Jane was born in the house of her father in Chauncerie Lane on the feast of Simon and Jude (Oct. 28), 1554, and died aged 32 years, ten weeks, and five days.

Dec. 23, 1587, he was married to Elizabeth,² widow of Richard Tempest, esq., and eldest daughter of Thomas Wentworth, of Elmesall, esq., by Christopher Taylor, vicar of Bradeforth, by whom he had three children, to wit, John,³ born at Bradley, about the eleventh of October, 1588, and a daughter,⁴ who was born in the year 1590, and lived not long, and Helena,⁵ a daughter who was born at Bradley, between 7 and 8 p.m. on the eve of Thomas the Apostle (Dec. 20), 1592.

The same Elizabeth⁶ died piously at Bradley, not long after the birth of the said Helena, on the Jan. 7, 1592(-3), in the morning, between two and three o'clock, most humbly commending herself into the hands of God Almighty, to Whom be praise for ever, and was buried at Eland.⁷

And the aforesaid Helena died and was buried near her mother, at Eland, the week after Easter, 1593.⁸

On the twenty-ninth of November, at St. Alban's, Michaelmas Term, the beginning of the 36th year (1593), there was directed to the same [Sir John] the writ for the rank of Serjeant-at-Law, returnable and executionable three days after Easter then next following.

GUNDREDA DE WARENNE;

FINAL AND CONCLUSIVE EVIDENCE.

EDITED BY SIR G. F. DUCKETT, BART.

Officer of Public Instruction in France, and Corresponding Member of the Society of Antiquaries of Normandy.

MORE than one paper has appeared in the Yorkshire Archaeological Journal on the parentage of Gundreda de Warenne, whose husband, William de Warenne, held large estates in Yorkshire, to which part he was yearly wont to repair, as appears in his Charter of Foundation to Lewes Priory. The following paper contained perhaps the clearest evidence yet adduced towards solving the problem of her relationship to the Conqueror.

We are bold enough to think, and humanly speaking to believe, that the Gundreda controversy is closed, but like a sleeping dog, no controversy is any the better for being roused or revived. Any differences on this subject, which has been pretty nearly thrashed out, can scarcely now exist, for the facts which have been brought to light and the conclusions resulting therefrom are quite convincing to any reasoning mind. Past generations had probably formed no very definite idea about Gundreda de Warenne. They took her for what an earlier race had represented her, a princess of the blood royal, and raised no question on that subject. It was left chiefly to the present generation to blunder hopelessly about the matter, and this was very much due to incompetent and self-sufficient critics, of whom Mr. Stapleton seems to have been the first.

The Foundation Charter of Lewes Priory, the unearthing of which stopped the mouths of one or two hair-splitting and incredulous parties; the confirmation charter of William de Warenne; the original charter of William the Conqueror, giving Walton to the monks of St. Pancras, and its genuine copy by Sir Richard St. George (of which further on), all proved that she derived her parentage from William and Matilda, and was one of the Royal Family, but it did not immediately strike either side of the disputants that the Council of Rheims in 1049, had placed the earliest of Duke William's children quite out of the line of legitimate descent, and that was the rock upon which the controversialists on both sides split, for it was not without some doubt that Gundreda could be assigned a proper place in the blood royal, and still less so as the fifth daughter of those parents, as some asserted. But notwithstanding the edict of the Council of Rheims, she was truly "filia mea," as the Conqueror calls her, and the daughter of Queen Matilda, as William de Warrenne calls her. It was only after long thought and research that we arrived at the following conclusions, which we verily believe will stand the test of time. The question is one which affects history, although the parties exercised little weight in that of this kingdom.

The settlement of the dispute depends entirely, as observed, on the decree of the Council of Rheims¹ in 1049, prohibiting the marriage of Duke William with Matilda, on the score of consanguinity, affecting all issue of the marriage up to that date, hence it was that William Rufus ascended the throne of England on the death of his father, being succeeded by his brother Henry I., in place of their elder brother Duke Robert of Normandy. Gundreda's age at her death is recorded to have been 35, and that age agrees exactly with the prohibition of the Council of Rheims, so that the year of her birth coincides in the most remarkable manner with the year preceding that prohibition. This would make Gundreda the eldest child, and all matters tend to prove this.

We believe our arguments in the present paper to be conclusive. We have written six or seven dissertations, ranging over some length of time, on this subject, all of which excepting one have appeared as articles in the Sussex Collections. We have slightly erred, like many more, in assigning Gundreda the place of a Royal Princess, otherwise we have nothing to retract, though what follows is in many respects a repetition of the substance of our last paper in 1886, laying down Gundreda's descent in conformity with the Rheims decree.

There are still some observations to add to that paper which will render the subject still more complete and assuring in respect of the mainstay of the Gundreda opponents, the presumed relationship assigned to her with one Gherbod, a Fleming. That she was named "sister to Gherbod" by Ordericus Vitalis was part and parcel of the influence exerted by the Church, for she was nothing more than his foster-sister: he did not wish to say who she really was. It was necessary for him to say something about the wife of so important a person as William de Warrenne, and knowing who she really was, the tenor of his observation speaks for itself. In that superstitious age when writing and literature, such as they were, were confined to monks, the monk of Ouche knew too well the danger to be incurred by infringing the decree pronounced on Duke William's marriage, after it had been rendered null and void.

Precisely the same inference may be drawn from the words of William de Warenne himself, "the mother of my wife," for it must be remembered that any stronger assertion would in that age have run counter to the decree of the Church, and no one would have dared to encounter the risk of saying more or less on its decrees. The whole difficulty therefore throughout the controversy, whether as "sister of Gherbod" or daughter of Duke William of Normandy, has arisen from having omitted to take into account the paramount influence exerted in those days by the Church of Rome, for if it had on the one hand power to prohibit the marriage in 1049 of two such exalted personages as Duke William and Matilda, and on the other to impose upon them, in expiation of their offence, a fine of such magnitude as the erection and endowment of the two memorable monasteries at Caen, how much more would people of that age have been careful and reticent in their language in respect of the offspring of a prohibited royal marriage. After-ages have reaped the consequences of overlooking such spiritual influence; whatever their veneration for the Church may have been, or is still, they took the applied nomenclature in question au pied de la lettre, and shut their eyes to all other explanations.

These reflections have dawned upon us after protracted dealing with the subject, and enable us, and it is to be hoped many others, to understand its whole bearing.

Perhaps the only, at first sight, plausible pieces of evidence adduced by the opposite side in this controversy was taken from Dom Bouquet, Liber iv., Epistola xxxii., Recueil des Historiens de la France, in which he gives a letter of Archbishop Anselm to Henry I. of England, warning him against allowing his daughter to marry the son of Earl Warenne and Gundreda, on the score of relationship. There are several remarks to be made on this matter, two sides being named as having a common relationship. The consanguinity which would have naturally first struck St. Anselm would have been that of Gundreda and Henry I. through Matilda their mother, but for reasons to be alluded to presently, that was plainly put aside by the Archbishop, and a relationship on the father's side, William de Warenne, was adopted instead.

The writer who brings forward this evidence (Mr. Chester Waters) equally ignores Gundreda, indeed the number of descents could not have applied to her in any case, but traces the consanguinity through William de Warenne, their father. Now the latter puts Gundreda out of the question from an endeavour to prove that she was neither a relation of Henry I. nor of his mother.

St. Anselm, on the other hand, as Primate of England, had a very different object in view. Gundreda had no existence in fact in this prohibitory warning. He traces the consanguinity instead through her husband, William de Warenne, for nothing can be plainer than his conduct in so doing, being quite in unison with three or four other examples we have cited, all depending on, or having their origin in the decree of the Council of Rheims, which placed the first-born children of William and Matilda quite out of the line of descent in the eyes of the Church, for the marriage prohibited by that Council did or had taken place as stated by Jumiegès; and it was not until 1053 that the decree was rescinded. The strongest possible motive also must have animated St. Anselm in adopting the course we name, for the hatred which Henry I. bore to his eldest brother Robert must have embraced undoubtedly a similar feeling towards his sister Gundreda. We have no direct proof of this feeling, but it is more than probable, knowing as we do on historical evidence the barbarous manner in which he treated his brother Robert, after taking him prisoner at the battle of Tinchebrai, depriving him of sight, and keeping him a close prisoner for life.

The reader will observe that we thus prove our case on the four or five controversial points in respect of Gundreda, through the Council of Rheims and its results.

Still, two instances in support of the foregoing must be mentioned, and without any wish to disparage the competency of English scholars, the similarity between the idioms of the French and Latin tongues enables the French critic to place frequently a wider meaning on words than strikes the Anglo-Saxon mind, thus it is with the word "soror."

One of the first antiquaries in Europe, and one of its most competent Latin scholars, the present Administrator of the National Library of France, who has edited for the French Government the Chronicle of Ordericus Vitalis, M. Léopold de Lisle, not only agrees fully in the sense of "sœur de lait" or foster-sister, as applicable to the word and its true meaning in this case, as used by Ordericus, but was so fully impressed with the conclusion we had come to that he stated his intention of bringing the subject before the department of National Records.

× S. Gundrede uxoris W. de Warennā²

¹ The name of this place appears to have been omitted by the original writer of the charter.

Royal side are all placed by themselves, namely, the Conqueror, Queen Matilda, Earl William (who ascended the throne as William Rufus), William de Warenne, and his wife Gundreda.

These names are all on the right hand side, one below the other. All signatories not of the Royal Family sign their names apart, on the left hand side of the charter. This is certainly an additional corroborative instance. Now this is the very charter which the monks of St. Pancras truly asserted had been taken back to Cluni, forming one of the Archives of that Abbey. The Gundreda opponents at one time pretended the said charter had no existence, in fact; and that the Confirmation Charter of William de Warenne was not sufficient evidence. The overhauling of the Cluni Records by ourselves has thus far, at any rate, been of service.

With respect to the other disputed charter, that of the Conqueror, some wise-acres, who would wish to be called savants, have been very assiduous during recent years in ventilating their opinions and throwing doubt on the words "filia mea." Now, most unfortunately for them, but very fortunately for others who have implicit faith in the authenticity of those words and the undoubted genuineness of that charter of William the Conqueror, there exists in the Bodleian Library among the Rawlinson MSS. (B 103, fo. 251), a copy of that very charter, made in the beginning of the seventeenth century by Sir Richard St. George, then Norroy King of Arms,¹ and in his own hand. This evidence is so strong and unimpeachable, that in itself it is sufficient to settle the question. We assert most distinctly that a Herald, so distinguished and well known in the field of antiquarian research, would never have made a copy of such a record had he entertained the smallest doubt as to the correctness of every word he copied. We ask if this would have been probable, or even possible. Nothing is more certain than that the said copy totally sets at rest the nonsense that has been published about it. We transcribed St. George's copy ourselves, some eighteen or twenty years ago, when working at the Bodleian.

We cannot think there can be, or ever will be found any other solution or mode of reconciling the contradictory evidence for and against the parentage of Gundreda de Warenne. We have adhered from the first to what has been handed down from age to age, and have not, like some in this controversy, gone out of our way to adduce every sort of theory in opposition to that tradition.

SOME PAPERS RELATING TO THE PLAGUE IN YORKSHIRE.

(Formerly the property of Col. Charles Fairfax.)

By S. J. CHADWICK, F.S.A.

THE Papers here published are now the property of Sir Thomas Brooke, Bart., of Armitage Bridge, the President of the Yorkshire Archæological Society, who has kindly allowed them to be printed. They originally belonged to Colonel Charles Fairfax, of Menston, near Otley, and Scow (or Scough) Hall in the parish of Fewston, near Knaresborough, who was a great antiquary and genealogist, and specially was the collector and recorder of the history of his own family. He left an enormous collection of MSS., a large portion of which descended to Thomas Pulleyn, who married the granddaughter of Colonel Fairfax. The late Sir Thomas Phillipps acquired from the Pulleyn family this part of the collection, and it was dispersed at his sale on 8th June, 1898, when the Papers here published were purchased by the present owner. Charles Fairfax was born at Denton, Yorkshire, 5th March, 1597, and was seventh and third surviving son of Sir Thomas Fairfax, of Denton and Nun Appleton, who became first Baron. After being educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, he was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1618, and about 1627 married Mary, sole heiress of the Breary family, of Scough Hall and Menston. He spent his life principally on his wife's estates. He devoted much time with his brother antiquary, Roger Dodsworth, to the searching for and rescuing many valuable works and documents. The collection and preservation of the Dodsworth MSS. in the Bodleian Library are said to have been the joint work of Charles Fairfax and Roger Dodsworth, and the MSS. were for some time in the care of the former. They are said to have been given to the Bodleian Library by Henry Fairfax, dean of Norwich. During the later years of the Commonwealth, Charles Fairfax was appointed Colonel of Foot, and he held that position in Monk's army at the time of the Restoration. He and Sir Henry Cholmley had joint charge of the second siege¹ of Pontefract Castle, and he was also appointed governor of Hull, but he held that office only about a year and then retired to Menston with a pension of £100 a year, granted to him by Charles II. out of the Hull Customs. He died at Menston in December, 1673, and his burial is recorded in the registers of Fewston Church, but he is said to have been buried in the Fairfax transept in Otley Church. See his Life by the Rev. Thomas Parkinson in the Dictionary of National Biography. Charles Fairfax appears to have been an active Justice of the Peace, and to have kept an autograph account of the important proceedings taken in the West Riding at the time of the plague in 1645. He would seem to have been the leader in most of these proceedings, and to have taken a very active part in relieving those places afflicted with the plague. He has appended Forms for use in the case of Town's apprentices, the searching of Broadcloth, &c. The MSS. also include orders made by the Court of Quarter Sessions in 1657 and 1658, in respect of Salmon Fisheries and the Treatment of Vagrants, but these are in a different handwriting, probably that of Alexander Richardson, Clerk of the Peace. The order about the plague at Thorne is dated 1632, and apparently has reference to an earlier outbreak of the disease. It is copied in Colonel Fairfax's own handwriting, and probably was regarded as a precedent for the proceedings in 1645. Although the plague seems to have been very bad in Thorne in 1632, there is no reference to it in the registers; so the vicar says in reply to an enquiry. There may possibly be some entries in the West Riding Sessions Rolls on the subject of the plague, but as to this I am unable to speak as the Clerk of the Peace has made no reply to an enquiry whether there are any entries, and whether such entries, if any, may be abstracted and printed. There are many references to the plague in the North Riding Sessions Rolls (see vols. 3, 4 and 6 of the North Riding Record Society's Publications), and it is unfortunate that there has been no opportunity of making a search of the West Riding Rolls. The plague seems to have been more or less in evidence in Yorkshire, and in fact in England, during the whole of the first half of the seventeenth century. See Creighton's History of Epidemics in Britain, and the Encyclopædia Britannica, article "Plague," also Wheatley's edition of Pepys' Diary, particularly vols. 4 and 5, and the supplementary volume of Pepysiana. In connection with the directions and remedies contained in the Fairfax MSS., Miss Ethel Stokes has called my attention to a pamphlet of Dutch Ordinances made in 1557, which is in the British Museum [Press Mark T 1717(9)], and which she has kindly translated so that it may be added as an Appendix to these Papers. Miss Stokes has also supplied me with

Lambeth Palace. Cartæ Miscellanæ (in 13 vols.).

Vol. 6 contains:—

- (No. 4) Letter from John Beale, Mayor of Maidstone, with thanks for £20 sent to the infected poor by the Archbishop.
- (Nos. 5-9) Letters re collections for and donations to the poor infected at Croydon, in Dover, Bangor diocese, and Carnarvonshire.

I have in my possession several black letter forms of prayer used in the time of plague, ranging from 1563 to 1640, some of which were to be used twice a week and some once. The earliest in date is—

One of these forms seems to have been used in Mirfield in 1631, when there was a severe outbreak of the plague in that place.

Unfortunately the plague became so common in England, that unless in exceptional cases no note was made of it in the parish registers; e.g., the Dewsbury Registers make no mention of the plague being in that town in 1645, although it must have been there at that time. I conclude by thanking all those friends who have assisted me in annotating the Fairfax Papers, and with other valuable help.

And in case noe goods be found, or ye parties refuse to pay ye same, they to be comitted to ye goale (gaol) till they satisfy ther taxation and ye arrers therof. The said taxes and rates to be certfied att ye next quarterly sessions, and to be

Wheras accordinge to the statute all ye townes within five miles compass have bene charged with weekly contributions to ye infected people of Leeds, and the sums occasionally increased upon increase of ye contagion unto ye summe of twenty pounds a weeke, over and besides thirty pounds weekly charged upon their owne parish, the said assessments (in regard of ye late heavy pressures) beinge exceedinge burdensome, and not to be eased but in General Sessions. And in case ye sickness shalbe further dispersed, or continue any tyme, itt is thought fitt and accordingly ordered that Staincliff and Ewcross shall pay ye weekly summe of tenne pounds, to be either abated in other parts or augmented to the rest for the uses aforesaid, att th'appoyntment of twoe of his Majestyes justices of peace.

Wheras by an order of ye last Generall Sessions held at Wakfeild in ye beginninge of July ther was a charge of £20 imposed upon ye wapontake of Claro, to be weekly payed towards the reliefe of the visited persons within ye parish of Leeds, ther beinge above £30 more upon ye wapontake of Skirack (Leeds being within their precincts), though in all other charges itt ought to beare but halfe proportion with the said wapontake of Claro, besides this further disadvantage, that it had bene formerly assessed for divers weeks to the summe of £50 when ther was noe charge upon Claro. Wheras the hand of God has bene continued for divers weeks upon the towne and parish of Whidkirke by the visitation of plague and pestilence, and that it doth appeare unto us by good certificat that they are unable any longer to relieve the poorer sort of their infected people. And wheras by order of the last general sessions, 11th July, held at Wakfeild, ther were (besides a totall discharge of divers townes within the wapentake of Barkston Ash) many other townes within ye wapentake of Skirack (which were allotted to Leeds upon a like occasion) drawne to a very low proportion, there beinge three parts of fower of ther due charge for a tyme suspended. These are therfore to will and require you, and yet nevertheless in his Majestyes name straitly to charge and comaund you to tax and assess ye townes aforesaid and their severall inhabitants, and all houses of habitation, lands, tenements and hereditaments, with ye said weekly summe of £10 (in such their due proportions as aforesaid) by distress and saile of their goods. And in defalt therof that you aprehend the persons refusinge and them safely convey to his Majestyes goale at York, untill they shall pay their said assess and arrers. From the "Pharmacopœia seu Antidotarium Messanense in quo tum simplicia tum composita Medicamenta usu recepta accurate examinantur Joannis Baptista Cortesii," printed at Messina in the year 1629, Dr. Collins gives me the following extract:—"Pilulæ Rusi vulgo pestilentes seu communes. R(ecipe) Aloes optimæ unc. ij. Myrrhæ unc. j. Croci unc. semis. Pilulæ hujusmodi Ruso adscribuntur & pestilenciales dicuntur, quod videntur advenire pesti; ratione enim aloes corpus ab excrementis liberatur quidem, a putredine vero vindicat myrrhæ; a croco cor & facultates vitales recreantur, sed quod pesti proficere queant, id videtur difficillimum creditu; nam pestis requirit medicamenta valentiora, magis cardiaca & alexipharmaca ad sui curationem ut ostensum fuit in meis miscellaneis."

DIRECTIONS UT SUPRA.

1. All justices as well within libertyes as without, viz., under severall commissions, are to consult together about execution of orders. After ther first generall assembly they are to distribut themselves to severall limitts for better dispatch of ye busyness, as in other services.

2. They are to enquier what townes be infected, and consider the welth and abilityes of the inhabitants.

3. To make a generall taxation, either by charginge ye towne infected with a gross summe, or spetiall persons of wealth therin, to be forthwith collected att first for one moneth, to be increased or deminished, ye same to be weekly imployed. The charge may be extended to further limits, and to write to ye justices of confininge shires for their contributions.

4. They are to appoynt in all parishes (infected or not infected) viewers of dead bodyes, who are to certify ye minister or officers what disease they dyed of; these are to have allowance accordinge to their danger, and to be sworne to make true report. Ye cūrate with 3 or 4 substant[iall men] of ye parish are to chuse them; if these through favor or corruption doe make wronge certificat, or if they refuse to serve, they shalbe imprisoned.

5. Houses by them certified to be infected are to be shutt upp for 6 weeks after that the sickness be ceased. In villages they have greater liberty, but must be restrayned from company, and weare a mark on ther garments, and beare white rodds. If they doubt ther observance of these directions 2 or 3 sworne watchmen by turnes are to be appoynted, who may stock such as come out of infected houses, dores marked, signes taken downe.

6. Honest persons to be chosen collectors, who shall allott a weekly proportion for victualls, fyer or medecins during restraunte. Gifts of charitable persons in corne, breade, &c., shalbe committed to honest men, who shall preserve and distribute it for their uses.

7. Dwellers in infected townes to provide and delyver necessaryes to the wealthy att ther owne charge, and to ye poore att the common charge. They must not converse with others, and beare a white rodd.

8. In great townes provision is to be bespoken of preservatives and remedyes (in contry villages ordinary remedyes).

9. Ministers and churchwardens must weekly certify the justices the numbers of infected persons that doe not dye, and such as dye, and of what diseases. And in 21 dayes itt is to be certified to the justices at their Assembly, and the clarke of the peace is to keepe a regester.

10. Places apart are to be appoynted for such buryalls; they are to be after sunsett and yet by daylight.

11. Justices of ye whole county or ridinge are to assemble once in 21 dayes to examin how the orders are kepte and certify the lords, &c., what townes be infected, persons dyed, monyes taxed, levyed and distributed to such uses, &c.

12. Justices of the hundred or next adjoyninge are to take weekly accounts, reforme neglects, or report them to ye generall Assembly.

13. Clothes, beddinge, &c., of infected persons that dye or recover, are to be either burnt or ayred as is before advised, and beinge of vallue to poore people, the justices shall releive them out of the collections in the countie.

14. Justices may devise other orders and certify them in writinge, and may imprison such as breake them.

15. For lack of justices the more number of justices may (att their assembly) chuse fitt persons to supply such defect.

16. Oppinions published that itt is vaine to forbear such place, the brochers therof are to be imprisoned.

17. The justices are to take great care of these comaunds, because the want of such needfull directions hath mainly occasioned the increase of the contagion.

ORDERS BY YE LORD MAIOR AND ALDERMEN OF LONDON.

Wheras by ye statute 1 James 31, authority is given to justices, &c., to appoynt within their limitts examiners, searchers, watchmen, keepers and buryers, and to minister oathes and give other directions, tis therefore thought fitt for prevention of infection now daungerously dispersed, that these officers be appoynted and orders likewise be prescribed.

Examiners. First, in every parrish ther are to be one, twoe or more persons of credit appoynted by ye justices to be examiners. They to continue in that office for 2 moneths att ye least, and (upon ther refusall) committed till they conforme. Ther oath may be administred by one justice of peace—To enquier and learne from tyme to tyme what houses in every parrish be visited and what persons be sick, as neare as they can informe themselves, and upon doubt to comaund restraint untill ye disease appear. If any person be infected they are to give order to ye constables to shutt upp his house, and to give notice of constables remissness.

Watchmen. That twoe watchmen be appoynted to every infected house, ye one by day, the other by night, who are to see that none goe in and out upon paine of punishment. They are to doe such further offices as ye sick house shall require, beinge sent on business must lock ye dore and take with them ye key. Watchmen by day are to attend untill 10 o'clock att night, and watchmen by night gard them till 6 in the morninge.

Searchers. Women searchers in every parrish must be of honest reputation and credit. Ther oath is—To make due search and true report to the uttmmost of their knowledge, whether ye persons whose bodyes they are appoynted to search doe dye of ye infection or other desease, as neare as they can. Surgeons are to joyne with them.

Housholders. The master of ye house is (upon complaint of botch or ill signe, &c.) to give notice to ye examiner within twoe howers after. Beinge found to be infected that night he shalbe shutt upp, and though he dye not yet ye house shalbe shutt for a moneth. Beddinge, apparrill and hangings to be well arred and perfumed before they be used. This must be done by ye examiner's appoyntment. None are to be removed, except to ye pest-house or other house of his owne upon security to discharge ye parish of ye cost, and ye remove to be by night. Any that has 2 houses may remove. But if he first send away the sounde, he may not send thither ye sick, nor e contra, and those are for one weeke to be shutt upp for feare of infection, though for ye present there be none appearinge.

Burialls. Buryalls are to be either before sunnrise or after sunset, with ye privity of ye churchwardens or constables, but noe neighbour to accompany the corps or enter the house upon paine of imprisonment or to be shutt upp.

Noe clothes, stuff, beddinge or garments to be carryed out, nor brokers of such things suffred upon paine of imprisonment.

Buyers, &c., of such stuff within 2 moneths, ther houses shutt upp 20 dayes.

Persons visited escapinge are to be brought back by night att the charge of that parrish from whence they went. The same to be punished att ye discretion of ye justices, and the house of the receiver shutt upp for 20 dayes.

A redd cross a foote longe to be sett on ye dores of ye visited people, with this inscription :—" Lord have mercy upon us." Watchmen are to keepe them in a moneth, and to minister necessaryes to ye rich att their owne, to ye poore att ye common charge.

Searchers, surgeons, keepers and buryers are to carry a redd or white rodd (for caution), and to avoyd all company.

Weekly taxes in every parish infected, in corporations by head officers, in ye country under ye next justice's hands, who may extend itt, give warrants for distress, in default wherof or of assistance, to committ, &c.

Rakers¹ to give notice by blowing a horne.

Privyes not emptyed in gardens.

Noe unwholsome victualls, musty corne or corrupt fruts, nor empty casks suffered to be sould in the citty.

Noe hoggs, doggs, catts, tame pidgeons or swine to stray.

Doggbillers to be appoynted in all places infected.

Constables to be carefull.

Games, singinge, ballads or causes of assemblys utterly prohibited, and punished by the justices; and offences in alehouses.

Justices to meete every tenne dayes.

PROCLAMATION, 23 April, 6 Caroli Regis (1630).

Wheras many excellent lawes for releife of ye impotent and punishment of rogues are made, which (duly observed) are for ye peace and plenty of ye realme, and ye neglect a cause of insufferable abuses, these tymes spetially requiringe executid, carefull watch is therfore injoynd that rogues be apprehended, punished, and sent by pass. Housholders wher they begg are to carry them to the constable and not releive them. Justices, by provost marshalls or high constables, or in their discretion, must provide ther be privy searches monthly att least. They must meet often, take accounts and punish ye remissee. All persons must use diligence to prevent infection. Judges shall inquire ye defaults of justices in not meetinge, or not punishing constables, not levyinge penaltyes and forfeitures. Negligent justices are to be removed out of commission or otherwise punished by ye kinge and counsaile. All judges, maiors, sheriffs, justices, constables, headboroughs, and other officers and subjects to doe itt att their perill. Selected statutes for ye poore, &c., to be printed. Offenders punished by law and prerogative justices of the peace, some of which it would be difficult to carry out at the present day, e.g. they were to look after "th' excesse of apparrell in marchauntes' wives & there daughters, lawyers' wives & there daughters, gentlemen's wives & there daughters, & in all degrees, to beginne wth some specciall instance; for hereby we prodigally waste or patrimonie, & is a pestilent canker in a Common wealthe the Confu-yon of all degrees" (Les Reportes, p. 57). Mr. Baildon on the whole has no hesitation in saying that as far as the present volume goes, substantial justice was done in the Court of Star Chamber (Introduction, lxi.), and his book certainly shows that the Court during the period covered by the Reports was no worse than the times.

¹ Camera Stellata, the Star Chamber. For information about the Star Chamber, and for assistance in identifying the persons named in Mr. Fairfax's MS., I am much indebted to a privately printed volume, Les Reportes del Cases in Camera Stellata, 1593 to 1609, from the original MS. of John Hawarde, of the Inner Temple, Esquire, Barrister-at-Law, edited by Wm. Paley Baildon, Esq., F.S.A., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. This volume amongst other things contains short notes or reports of most of the cases heard in the Star Chamber between the dates 1593 and 1609, but it does not contain the cases of Rice Griffin and John Scripps here mentioned, although there are several cases of the kind in the volume, and building houses in London contrary to the various proclamations was punished in that court. Mr. Baildon says that the houses were generally ordered to be pulled down, "which is," says Hudson (Treatise on the Star Chamber), "surely very necessary, if anything would deter men from that horrible mischief of encreasing that head which is swoln to a great hugeness already." Mr. Baildon gives a list of the several offences punished in the Star Chamber, and of the principal cases over which it exercised jurisdiction (see Introduction to Les Reportes, lvi. and lvii.). Many directions were given to

² The Dewsbury Parish Registers have no entries for the year 1645 referring to the plague. There are many entries for the year 1593 of deaths from the plague in Dewsbury and Ossett, and there are a few entries in other years of deaths in one family on the same day, or on succeeding or nearly succeeding days, which may possibly be attributed to the plague. In the neighbouring parish of Mirfield the plague raged in 1631, and the entries of deaths from the plague occupy two and a half pages of the parish register. The first entry is in April, "a poor woman being a stranger named Elizabeth Prince, 25th day, who was reported to bring the plague to town." There was no other death from the plague until 12th May, when the following entry occurs, "Buried, Jennet Fraunce, widow, being the first person after the foresaid stranger who died of plague." I have in my possession a fragment (found many years ago amongst some papers from a Mirfield house) of a black letter "Forme of Common Prayer, Together with an Order of Fasting; For the auerting of God's heauy Visitation," &c. &c. This form appears to have been printed by the king's printers in 1625, and it seems therefore likely that it was used in Mirfield in 1631.

Lett this be presented to ye justices at ye committee, who will please to appoynt ye distribution herof with greatest equality, the summes here mentioned beinge sett downe upon conference and best information not only of ye solicitors (who are partyes) but of substantiall neighbors of good credit. If they please tis humbly desyred that Haworth and Heptonstall, beinge remote places, may have some abatement of ther wonted proportions, and that £250 per week may be charged upon ye whole Westriding, out of ye surplus wherof this may be done. And ther will remaine a little residue for addition to other places upon occasion, and for rewards, or to make upp wher it cannot be gathered.

C: Fairfax.

Darcy Wentworth.

BY YE ¹[JUSTICES OF THE] STANDINGE COMMITTEE FOR YE WESTRIDINGE.

Upon consideration of ye order of ye sessions att Knaresborough, and ye summes proportioned ther for ye releife of each particular towne infected with ye plague within the Westriding, it is thought fitt that the summe of £250 per weeke be for ye present charged upon the said whole Westriding, accordinge to ye usuall and accustomed manner, which is recomended to be levyed by order of ye said sessions by the cheife constables respectively, by distress of ye goods of ye persons refusinge or neglectinge to pay, or otherwise, accordinge to the statute in that behalfe, which summes soe levyed are to be payed in each severall wapentack to such treasurer, and are to be expressed in ye warrant to ye cheife constables as shalbe thought fitt. And because the allowances already agreed on to the infected townes are necessary to be enlarged, deminished or altered as ther shall be occasion, the same is referred to any twoe of ye justices of the peace of ye said Westriding, who are all desyred forthwith to meete and agree within what limits twoe of them shall take care and give direction weekly for issuinge and disposinge of the said moneys as they shall judge to be necessary, havinge respect to the places which now are or which may hereafter happen to be infected, and to take off the weekly maintenance where they are cleared and sett att liberty. And the same justices are also desired to give order for governinge the infected places as they shall thinke convenient. And touchinge the infected townes, they are to be rated accordinge to their severall proportions, and the summe allowed for their weekly maintenance to be payed, yet soe as they shall retaine their particular proportions in part of payment, and as much as their proportion of assessment falls short is to be made upp to such farther summe weekly as the said twoe justices shall appoynt. And in respect of the particular necessities of each respective towne infected, the said twoe justices are to give allowance as to their discretion shalbe thought fitt, they havinge respect to ye statute in that behalfe provided.

by way of deduction out of ther weekly assessments, or to be otherwise supplied towards ther charge, in all amountinge to the summe of £247 16s. 8d. All and every the said severall summes to be weekly charged upon the said Westriding & proportioned accordinge to ther usuall rates and assessments, with respect had as well to personall as reall estates, and soe to be continued till further order, but to be deminished upon decrease of ye sickness, and taken off when ye townes be cleared and ye people admitted to their former intercourse. And because soe great a summe will lay heavy upon ye country, it is desyred that ther may be frequent meetings of ye justices of peace in ye severall wapentakes for dispatch of ye busyness, the takinge accounts of ye moneys taxed, levyed and distributed, for appoyntment of examiners and others for ye execution of orders and superintendency over constables and officers, whose remissness in ye service may endanger ye country. And tis thought fitt ther be a spetiall collector in every wapontak, beinge a man of credit, to receive ye moneys and to assist ye high constables and petty constables in ye levys therof, and ye same to pay over to John Savil, of Methley, Esq., ye treasurer of ye ridinge, for the purpose aforesaid, or by his allowance and approbation to issue the same within ther severall limits to infected places accordinge to their due proportions, and every three weeks att ye furthest to attend him with their accounts. And wheras ther will remaine a surplus of £2 3s. 4d. of ye said sume of £250 undispos'd of, it is thought fitt and accordingly ordered that Maior Carter for his vigilancy and care over

Leeds, Bradford and Wakfeild, shall have a weekly allowance of 23s. 4d. And th'other 20s. shall be equally divided betwixt such as take ye care of Hallifax and Pontfraise. And for that it is conceived that divers of ye townes to which ye respective summes of 10s. are severally assigned may after one weeke be enlarged, and likewise some others that have greater proportions within a short tyme, or not need such allowances. It is lastly ordered that if ye monyes herby charged extend not to make satisfaction to charitable persons of their reasonable summes by them advanced in way of loane for releife of ye visited upon urgent necessitys, or to such townships as have bene unduly charged through neglect of officers not pursuinge their orders, that out of these monyes soe taken off as aforesaid (for twoe moneths after the date of this order), his Majestyes justices may see ye same employed towards ther reimbursments. And after that tyme it is hoped ther will be a generall abatement both of sickness and allowances.

Com. Ebor.

To ye severall high constables, collectors, receivers and distributors of moneys to infected persons within ye three severall wapentakes of Skirack, Agbrigg & Morley, and Staincliff and Ewcross, greeting.

Wheras through ye mercy of God ther is a great decrease of ye sickness which has long continued in divers parts, and of late had overspread the whole Westridinge, soe that ye generall charge therby occasioned may be taken off or at least abated. And wheras (besides ye voluntary contributions of many well-affected persons) there has bene severall allotments to divers places by his Majestyes justices, and there limits and allowances occasionally extended by generall sessions, but noe account att all yet rendred of such receipts and disbursments unto his Majestyes justices, from whom satisfaction may be justly expected, as well by ye contry as by higher authority. To ye intent therefore that noe place may be burdened above itt due proportion, nor any abated through partiall exemption. Nor ye monyes soe taxed be unjustly detayned, or such Christian charities basely perverted. These are therefore in his Majestyes name to comaund you and every of you to appeare before us or some other of his Majestyes justices att Chappell Pudsay,¹ upon ye 15th day of December next by eight in ye morninge, then and there to make a perfect account (either by bill, information or otherwise) what moneyes were by you levyed and distributed to ye uses aforesaid, as likewise what gifts or loanes you received from charitable persons in monyes or provisions? And how you disposed them? What loanes are unsatisfied, and what somes are rated and assessed, but not received? You are likewise to bring certificats of the totall numbers of persons deceased in every townshipp since your first visitation, what townes still continue infected, how many houses therin, whether ye inhabitants be able to maintaine their people restrained, and how many ther are that live upon charity, when ye contagion beganne, and ye last person dyed, that their releife and allowances (if ther appeare any cause of continuance) may be reasonably proportioned; and likewise to give a full account of the execution of those orders formerly injoynd in the begininge of this sickness, and information of remissness and negligence both of constables and officers. FOR SEARCHINGE BROADE CLOATH.

Whereas by and in the statutes of Parliament made tercio Eduardi sexto, in the 39th yeare of Queene Elizabeth, amongst other things it was then enacted—That in any towne or village where broad cloath shalbee made and sould, two of his Majesties justices of the peace within the division shall have full power to call before them 2, 4 or more sufficient men of every towne or hamlett and them appointe overseers for one whole yeare, and shall take them sworne and bound in recognizance in good sommes of money to his Majesties use, to doe their best endeavour by all lawfull wayes and meanes to see the said statutes and all other statutes in that case made and provided, truely observed and kepte accordinge to the true meaneinge thereof. Now forasmuch as A and B, of C, clothiers, have come before us, Ferdinando Fairfax, Knight,¹ and C. F., Esq., justices of the peace within the Westriding of the said countie of Yorke, and taken their corporall oath and entred into recognizances of £40 to his Majesties use to doe their best endeavour for the tyme beinge to see the said statutes for the makeinge, markeinge, weight, bredth and length of wollen cloathes in all pointes duely and truely observed and kepte, wee therefore by vertue of the said statutes doe constitute, ordaine and appointe the said A & B to bee overseers and searchers of wollen cloath in the towne and parish where they now live for one whole yeare followinge, authorizeinge them to make diligent search soe often as they thinke fittinge for the findeinge out of any woollen cloath which shalbee defective and made contrary to the said lawes and statutes, and also execute all and every the thinges which belonge to ther office, and att thende of their tearme to make a just accompte what forfeitures are received, to the end that the same may bee disposed of accordinge to the intende and true meaneinge of the said statutes. Com. Ebor.

Forasmuch as (by the greate abundance of wandring rogues and concourse of beggars and strangers forth of all parts of this and other countyes adjoyning, more of late then heretofore) itt appeareth that there is a generall neglect and no care had by petty constables, nor regard by the househoulders, who are injoynd by the statute to bringe every strange beggar (begginge att his house) to the constable to be punished upon payne of tenn shillings, forfeited to the use of the poore of the same parrish for every such default. And for that divers in every townshipp and parrish doe usually lodge such wandring and strange beggars, and for that likewise the churchwardens and overseers for the poore doe not see their owne poore releived according to the statute in that case provided. And whereas divers orders of general sessions have bene established for the suppressinge of wakes,¹ feasts, tides,² revellings at country weddings and sundry others such disorderly meetings, especially upon the Lord's day, where unto such vagrant and idle persons of leude behaviour doe usually resort, and much excessive drinking and minstrilsy is used to draw such leude persons together to the great dishonor of God,

² Tide—A country fair, feast or festival. Originally time, hour, season, e.g. Christmastide, Eastertide, Whitsuntide. contempt of justice and countenanceing of impiety. These are therefore to will and require you, & in his Highness' name straitely to charge and command you, to give notice to every petty constable within your division to make dilligent search att whose houses such wandring idle beggars are lodged, and that they lodge none but such as, haveing lawfull passes, shall be appointed them by the constable to lodge, and that they according to the law doe cause a day watch to be constantly kept in every townshipp, itt being advised by former orders of generall sessions that a continuall watchman be hyred at the comon charge of each towne for prevention of such abuses and disorders. And that from henceforth there be no such wakes, feasts, tides or assembles kept, and you are likewise to present the names of all such petty constables as shall neglect their dutyes, and of all such persons as by them or the said watchmen shall be charged to assist them, shall (sic) refuse to obey them. And not only yourself, but each petty constable within your division, and one churchwarden of every parrish, are to give an accompt of the due execucion of this our warrant both as to the punishment of rogues and releife of their owne poore, att our next monthly meeting att, &c., where they are upon oth to present such other misdemeanors as are done and committed within theire precincts. Att ye generall quarterly sessions of ye publike peace held at Wetherby, the twelvyth day of January, 1657, before Francis Thorpe,¹ serjeant att law, Sir Robert Barwick, Knight, Henry

¹ Francis Thorpe was eldest son of Roger Thorpe, of Birdsall, Yorkshire, by his wife Elizabeth, daughter of Wm. Danyell, and was born in 1595. He was admitted Student of St. John's College, Cambridge, in November, 1611, and graduated B.A. in 1613. He became a member of Gray's Inn, February, 1611, and was called to the Bar in May, 1621. Autumn reader of that Inn, 1641, and recorder of Beverley, 1623 to 1649, he was also recorder of Hull, 1639 to 1648, and made a speech at the reception of Chas. I. on his visit to Hull in April, 1639. He was a member of the Long Parliament, and a witness against the Earl of Strafford. He acted as Judge or Commissioner of Assize at York in March, 1648, and delivered a verbose charge to the Grand Jury, which was printed both in York and London. On 1st June, 1649, Thorpe became a Baron of the Exchequer, having previously been appointed a Commissioner for the trial of the king. At this time, and for a year or two afterwards, he appears to have been on the side of the Parliament, and to have been severe on the Royalists, e.g. John Harrison, of Leeds (Whitaker's Loidis and Elmete, pp. 1-8). Subsequently he had differences with Cromwell as to proceedings against the insurgents in the North, and was disgraced in 1655, which made him popular, and he was elected to represent the West Riding in the Parliament of September, 1656. He had some difficulty about obtaining pardon at the Restoration, and there was some scandal about his detaining a sum of £25,000 which came into his hands as Receiver of Money in Yorkshire. In a debate in parliament on the subject, Prynne hinted that Thorpe deserved the sentence of death like a former judge and namesake, Sir Wm. Thorpe. He, however, escaped this fate, which many better men had suffered, and died in his bed at his residence, Bardsey Grange, near Leeds, and Fairfax,¹ Thomas Heaber and Henry Attkinson, Esquires, justices assigned to heare and determine all felonys, trespasses and other misdemeanors committed and done within the parts of ye west ridinge of ye county of Yorke.

Forasmuch as ye severall Statutes and Acts of Parliament made 13 Edw. I. 47, 13 Rich. II. 19, 17 Rich. II. 9, forbidd the takinge of salmons in ye rivers of Owse, Wharfe, Ayre, Nyd, Yore, Swayle, and other waters where salmons are taken, from ye Nativity of oure Lady unto St. Martin's day, and likewise do forbid ye takinge of younge salmons by netts or other engins whatsoever they be, whereby the fry or breede of salmons or other fish may be taken or distroyed, att millpooles, milldames, or other places, from ye midst of Aprill to ye Nativity of St. John Baptist.

And further ye said statutes do direct that there shall be overseers of these statutes within ye places aforesaid, to finde out and discover ye offenders, and that for ye first offence ye offenders shall be punished by burninge theire nets and engins, and for ye second offence they shall be imprisoned for a quarter of a yeare, and for ye third offence they shall bee imprisoned for a whole yeare.

And alsoe ye said statutes doe appoynt and impower justices of ye peace to be conservators of ye said statutes, and to inquire of and discover ye offences aforesaid, and to surveye and search all ye weares in ye said rivers that they be not strait, or whereby ye fry of fish may be taken and distroyed.

And likewise commandes ye said justices to appoint and putt good and sufficient under-conservators of ye said statutes, who shall be sworne to like surveyinge search of punishinge without any favor therein to be shewn, and to make presentment thereof to ye justices of the peace at theire sessions, to be proceeded against as ye statutes appoynts.

And further ye statute 2 Hen. VI., 15, doth upon ye penaltie of five pound forfeiture forbid ye puttinge or settinge of any netts called trincketts² or other netts, which stand continually night and day in waters for takeing of fish, and whereby the frye is distroyed.

² Trincketts, trinks, trynkes—Nets or engines for catching fish. See Blount's Law Dictionary and Halliwel's Dictionary, s. v. "Trink." Trynkes is the Norman-French form given in the statute 2 Hen. VI., c. 15.

any nett, devise or engins whereby ye younge broode, spawne or frye of eles, salmons, picerrils¹ or other fish shall be distroyed at floodgates, tayles of mills, weares, straites, streames or brookes; and alsoe forbidds ye takinge or killinge of salmons or trouts out of season or beinge kipper² or shedders;³ and forbides ye takeinge away any pickerill¹ under tenn inches longe, fish of salmon under sixteene inches longe, fish of trouts under eight inches longe, fish of barbell under tweelve inches longe.

And further forbidds ye usinge any netts to take fish but such as are in the mash two inches and halfe broad, as by the said severall statutes and acts of parliament appeares.

Now in pursuance of the said statutes and for better execution of the same, and in respecte of the greate abuses complayned on to be practized in the unlawfull takeinge and distroyinge fish in the forenamed rivers and contrary to the said statutes, and for preventinge of the like abuses for tyme to come, the justices of peace assembled at these sessions doe hereby appoynt and authorize William Normaviell of Harwood, Francis Mitchell of the Grange, William Meade of Burley, James Batty of Poole, William Hardisty of Newall, Lieutenant Colonel William Croke of Askwith, Francis Greene of Addingham, Shefeild Clapham of Bethmesley, Joseph Watkinson of Ilkley, John Lupton of Gaston, William Picard of Middleton, John Preston of Appletrewicke, Francis Todd, William Tennant of Chappell houses, Thomas Browne of Arncliffe, John Smith of Old Coates, William Fawcett of Kettelwell, Thomas Ward of North Coate, Stephen Watkinson of Ilkley, Thomas Wood of Wetherby, gent., Simon Dodsworth, James Rhodes, John Richardson, Richard Cutbert of the same, John Moyses of Leathley, Edmund Barker of Ottley, Thomas Hammond of Threshfeild, Mr Reynald Heabor of Hollinge Hall, William Stackers of Hartlington, Robert Morley and Robert White of Tadcaster, to be under-conservators of the said statutes in the river of Wharfe and the waters runinge in or oute of the same.

And Henry Wardell of Kirkhamerton, Richard Paull of Cattell, William Thompson of Hunsingore, George Lucas of Knarsbrough, Matthew Wood of Dacre, Phillip Richardson of Bewerley, George Loope and Robert Jackson of Burrow Bridges, to be under-conservators of the said statutes in the rivers of Nidd, Yore, and the waters runinge into or out of the same.

and kepper trout are mentioned in statute 1 Eliz., c. 17, sec. 1.

³ Shedder salmon and shedder trout are also mentioned in 1 Eliz., c. 17, sec. 1. Qy., does shedder mean female?

And Nicholas Smithson of Aldbrough, William Lockwood of Dunsforth, John Atkinson of Widdington, gent., John Dickingson of Greate Usburne, and William Wilkinson of Nunmunckton, to be under-conservators of the said statutes in the rivers of Swale and Ouse, and the waters runinge into or oute of the same.

And the said severall under-conservators before-named and every of them are hereby required to survey, search, and doe accordinge to the said statutes, and seize all the foremencioned unlawfull netts and engins which they shall finde used within their severall offices, and to make presentment of all and every the offences done against the said statutes, to the end such further proceedings may be thereupon had, as the said lawes requires and doe direct.

Ordinances made by the Court of Holland, the last day of September, 1557.

Whereas the pest and “hasty sickness” (God amend it) is prevalent in divers towns, villages and places lying hereabouts, making it possible that the said sickness might also be brought into this district of the Hague, and likewise be further spread here than now it is, the more especially as the orders and ordinances heretofore published and ordained in this behalf are not wholly obeyed and maintained, on which account the said sickness may possibly come to be spread, to the great detriment of the inhabitants and of the common weal; therefore, in order to provide against the same, and to prevent all inconveniences, and to assure the health and safety of all the burghers and inhabitants of the Hague, and to establish good order in all points, the Court commands and firmly enjoins the observance of all and singular the following items and articles.

(ii.) In the first place, whenever the pest or “hasty sickness” happens to occur in any house in this place or within the jurisdiction thereof, or any doubt that it be so, those of the said house or household, be it man, woman, boy or girl, shall be obliged and held answerable forthwith to declare the same, and make known to their nearest neighbours that the said sickness is in their house, or that they fear the same, so that they may have the sick in the aforesaid house visited by the sworn pest-master, or others commissioned in that behalf, and the said visitation having been made, order may at once be taken for the remedy thereof and further arrangements be made, under a penalty, if any household be found not to have spoken and declared themselves, of thirty Carolus gulden to be paid by the master or mistress of the household, to be divided into three parts,—one part thereof for the officer, a second part to the use of the pest-house, and the third part to the informer. And in addition thereto to undergo summary correction for the offence in accordance with its circumstances and the inconveniences it may occasion.

(iii.) Item as soon as the abovesaid sickness occurs in any house, & any one there is seized with the same, the household shall be obliged and held answerable forthwith, and without anyone's leaving the said house, to hang up on the ground-floor or on the first storey over the gate, door, or entrance, a bundle of straw an ell in length and as thick as a man's leg, on pain of a penalty of 20 Carolus gulden from the master or mistress of the house where this shall be omitted, to be divided as above.

(iiii.) Item this bundle of straw shall be kept hanging there, and no one shall remove it, or take away, or cause to be taken away any part thereof, for a period of six weeks continuously when any one has died in the said house of the sickness, and for a period of fourteen days after any person suffering from the sickness has left or been taken away from the said house, and has not died there; under the same penalty, to be divided as above.

(v.) Item whenever any one falls ill of the said sickness in any house, the bundle of straw is to be kept hanging there as above described continuously during the whole period of his sickness, and if he recovers, for fourteen days after he is completely restored; and if he die or is removed, then for the period above laid down, under a penalty, to be divided as before.

(vi.) Item whenever the said sickness has occurred in a house, and any one has died there or been carried away, and those of the household desire to depart therefrom and go away, they shall be obliged and held answerable forthwith to padlock all the outside doors and entrances to the said house, at the back, in the front and at the sides, and to fence the said house round with an iron chain, and to inform the officer of their departure through their friends or neighbours, together with the date when the sickness occurred there, and any one died or was carried away, that he may have a record of the said date and may thereby regulate his prohibitions or permissions, under a penalty of twelve Carolus gulden from the master or mistress of any house failing herein, or from the neighbour or friend who has received the charge and fails to execute it,—to be divided as above.

(vii.) Item to the end that the said house may be better kept shut, and for the greater assurance that it shall not be opened before the due season, in addition to the fencing and padlocks abovedescribed, the aforesaid officer shall have another padlock fixed by a locksmith to the gates or doors of such houses, the key of which shall remain in the keeping of the said officer; and any one opposing the forging and closing thereof shall pay a penalty, to be divided as above, and shall moreover receive correction at the hands of the court.

(viii.) Item if the members of any household, where a person has been taken ill of the said sickness and has died or been removed, do not desire to remove from the said house but wish to remain there, or at any rate some of them, then they, and also those who keep and tend the sick at home, shall wait and avoid going out and mixing with others, and shall not mingle with the good people in markets, churches or other places where there are gatherings of men, to buy victuals or other things in any way whatsoever, nor go to or into any other houses or inns for the period of six weeks from the time when anyone has died in their house, or of fourteen days after such person has been removed or is recovered, under a penalty of 10 Carolus gulden from the master and mistress of the household, to be divided as above.

(ix.) Leave shall be given to one person only and not more to go from each house to the meat-house and fish-market and elsewhere, to buy victuals and other necessities; such person shall go to these places at such times as there are fewest people going and coming, it being understood that the people buying or bargaining for victualls shall in no wise handle or touch the same, but shall only show and point out with their fingers those they wish to buy, under a penalty of 12 Carolus gulden, to be divided as above.

(x.) It is fitting that such person, and also others belonging to houses smitten as aforesaid who desire to go out, shall be obliged to carry openly and publicly a white peeled rod, two ells long, not hiding it under tabard, cloak or mantle, or elsewhere; and they shall not be allowed to go round-about the streets, or to remain standing outside, in or in front of any houses, but if they want to go out shall only walk to refresh themselves, and in that case shall be obliged each to go the nearest way from his house, from the district where he may be living, and to return homewards by the same way, without mingling or mixing with the people happening to be there either on his outward or homeward way; it being understood that any such person desiring to go to church may do so on Sundays and Saints' days, by attending St. Anthony's chapel on the Geest only, and shall not resort to any other churches or places of worship under a penalty of twelve Carolus gulden as above, to be divided in like manner.

(xj.) Item that no one in a stricken house, or returning to such a house, shall fetch any water for the household in person, or draw water by day or night from the wells or springs standing in the neighbourhood or on the street; but whenever they are in need of water they shall put one or more buckets outside their door, and ask some of the neighbours (at speaking distance) to fetch them some water; and afterwards, when they have closed the door, the neighbour shall go or send some one to draw water in his own bucket or vessel, and shall pour it into the buckets put before the house door as above described, and the people of the stricken house shall then fetch them in and close the door to at once, under a penalty of 12 Carolus gulden as before, to be divided as above.

(xij.) Item that in a house where any one has died of the plague, no one shall air or disturb any gutter in the house, or in the garden or courtyards of the same for a period of six weeks after the last death, and having first obtained permission from the officer for that purpose. Any one keeping straw and burning it in such houses, shall take care that no danger of fire is caused thereby, under pain of a fine and summary correction.

(xiiij.) Item if any one visit any sick persons lying in a house which he knows to be smitten with the plague, such person so visiting shall be thenceforth bound to carry the white rod as set forth above for the space of 14 days after such visit, and shall avoid people during the same period in like manner as is prescribed for others coming out of smitten houses, under a penalty of twelve Carolus gulden, to be divided as before.

(xiiij.) In like manner those who depart and flee from smitten houses shall carry a white rod, and avoid other people just as if they had remained in the houses, for the same period and under a like penalty.

(xv.) Item that all scrubbers (scrobbers), male and female, and all other persons of what quality so ever, who have charge of persons sick of the plague, or having business in any smitten house (except the pest-master), shall likewise be obliged to carry a white rod, and to avoid coming into contact with people, and to bear themselves and behave in general like the people of the house where any one has died of the plague or been carried away, as is set forth and declared for the same in these ordinances, under the penalties therefor appointed.

(xvj.) White rods shall also be carried by those who are appointed to fetch the dead out of the houses, and bring them to the grave. And moreover they shall not be allowed to visit the fish-market either by night or day, sitting on the fish-benches on which the fish will be laid, or on the barrels and measures, under a penalty of six Carolus gulden, to be divided as above, and a further punishment at the discretion of the sheriff and justice.

(xvij.) Item that all persons bringing into their houses or rooms persons, old or young, stricken with the plague, shall be bound (whether such sick die or not) to conform to the regulations set forth above with regard to the putting out the bundle of straw, the carrying of rods, &c. &c., just as if the said persons had first fallen sick at their houses, under the penalties above appointed.

(xviii.) That when any of the sick above said come to die, no one shall bury them either inside or outside the church except within the following times, to wit, from the middle of March to October, before six o'clock in the morning and after eight o'clock in the evening; and from October to the middle of March, before seven o'clock in the morning and after seven in the evening, forbidding all and singular to bring to the grave any such persons dead of the plague as aforesaid, during the day, and after or before the hours set forth above, under pain of summary punishment by the bailiff and aldermen of the Hague. Neither shall any persons bring people sick of the plague to the sick-house during the day, or elsewhere through the streets, except within the hours above set forth, under a like pain.

(xix.) That those accompanying to the grave persons dead of the said sickness, and coming from an infected house, shall not penetrate further into the church than as far as the two first altars standing nearest the doors, called St. Barbara's altar and "Ruich Rocxs" Chapel, where the pastor shall receive his offerings, and they shall not go further east into the said church under a penalty of six Carolus gulden.

(xx.) All infected dead to be buried in the churchyard shall be buried on the north side of the church, between the church and the Lombard's House; and the graves shall be made of the accustomed depth, not placing two or more one on the top of another. And as soon as the corpses have been buried the graves shall be immediately filled up and not suffered to remain open, under a penalty to be laid on the grave digger of four Carolus gulden to the officer for every offence.

(xxj.) Item that in houses where any one has died of the plague, no doors or windows opening on the street shall be set or kept open except between nine o'clock in the evening & six in the morning, under a penalty of xij. Carolus gulden, to be divided as before.

(xxij.) That no person whatsoever of any condition, man or woman, old or young, dead of the plague, shall be placed in his coffin or brought to the grave, privately or publicly, except by those thereto commissioned by the bailiff and justices, under a like penalty as above, to be divided as aforesaid.

(xxij.) Item that the bell shall be tolled for those who die of the plague on one day only, to wit after the benediction, except for those willing to make payments of which the church will reap the profit.

(xxiiij.) That no one shall bring household stuff, clothes or other goods from any house stricken with death or the sickness to be sold in the Hague or in the district round the Hague, or shall send them to be sold, either privately or publicly, and no one shall buy the like, unless the same have been duly exposed and aired for eight days previously, under a penalty to the bringer, seller and purchaser, each of twelve Carolus gulden, to be divided as aforesaid.

(xxv.) Item that no one, of whatsoever condition or quality, shall continue to bring, to buy or to sell, in this district, either secretly or in public, old clothes, old linen and other things from houses or other places outside the district where the plague and other contagious sicknesses prevail or have prevailed, under a penalty for each offence of 25 Carolus gulden from the bringer or seller, and likewise from the buyer of the goods aforesaid, to be divided as before; and all such clothes, linen and other things brought here will be publicly burnt.

(xxvj.) Item no tavern-keeper or inn-keeper, whoever he be, shall suffer things to be brought into his house from stricken or suspected houses or other places as aforesaid, under a like penalty, to be divided as above, and in addition the houses of those so offending shall be closed for six weeks.

(xxvij.) Item that no one shall bring to the Hague for sale any flesh, cheese, milk, eggs, fruit, victuals, provisions, or other goods whatsoever, from any house where the aforesaid sickness prevails or has prevailed within 6 weeks, whether any one has died or been carried away there or not, nor shall stand in the market with flesh or fish coming from such a house, on pain of forfeiting such goods in addition to the penalty above imposed as aforesaid.

(xxviiij.) Item that no person of what quality soever shall come to the Hague from any towns, villages, or places where the aforesaid sickness prevails, if the said sickness has occurred in the house from which he comes within 6 weeks, or if he has returned within that period to such stricken house, under a penalty for each such offence, or for refusing to (?) depart (expurgeren) when warned, of 25 gulden, to be divided as above, or to be otherwise summarily dealt with.

(xxix.) Item that no tavern-keepers or inn-keepers shall receive or give accommodation to such persons, coming as aforesaid from stricken houses and places, under a penalty for each offence against this ordinance of xxv. Carolus gulden, to be divided as above.

(xxx.) Item that all scrubbers, male and female, dwelling in the Hague, who go to other places to scrub and tend the sick, shall from henceforth remain at such other places, and not come into the Hague for this season under pain of being banished for a year from the Hague and the Hague district, and an additional summary punishment from the bailiff and aldermen.

(xxxj.) Item that no scrubbers, male or female, or other persons living outside the Hague employed in scrubbing, or tending those sick of the plague aforesaid, shall come to the Hague, but shall remain living outside during the same time under penalty as above.

(xxxij.) Item in order to prevent all stench, foulness, and evil smells that might tend to increase the sickness aforesaid, or spread it further, it is ordered that every householder shall clean out the gutter in front of his house twice a week, to wit, on Wednesdays and Saturdays, or on the vigil of a Saint's day if there be a Saint's day in the week, and shall rid it of all foulness and muck, and make it clean with water, and gather the filth on to his own muck-heap so that no stench may arise, and that the water may flow freely, under a penalty of three Carolus gulden, to be distributed as above; those living at the top of the street shall begin, and then in succession all down the street. This is to be done before seven o'clock in the morning or after 6 o'clock in the evening.

(xxxij.) The bailiff and aldermen of the Hague shall be obliged once every two months to make an inspection of the streams, and to cleanse them of all filth, so as to let the water coming in from above run through to its appointed place, under penalty, in case of neglect, of summary punishment by the Court.

(xxxiiij.) Item that no one shall throw dead dogs, cats, chickens, or other dead animals on the streets, nor put them in receptacles for rubbish, but must put them in the rubbish-carts, or bury them in the earth in their yards, under a penalty, to be divided as above.

(xxxv.) Item that no one keeping dogs shall suffer them to run through the streets, but shall keep them tied up at home, on pain of having them killed in the streets by persons appointed for that purpose.

(xxxvj.) Item that the drivers of the aforesaid rubbish carts shall be careful that in none of their journeys do they leave any carrion or other stinking matter lying in the streets or on the roads; but they shall take up all such matter and carry it away to the proper places, under pain of summary punishment for breach of this regulation.

(xxxvij.) Item that all public middens and muck-heaps shall be entirely cleared off and carried away every Saturday, not a thing being left, under a penalty of four pounds, to be paid by the muck-contractors of the Hague.

(xxxviii.) That neither in gardens nor places through which there is a public way shall any one collect dung, muck or other filth, or take any such from out of doors into their houses under a penalty of xxv. Carolus gulden; and those who have collected such shall be obliged to cart it away during the night by moonlight, under a like penalty of xxv. gulden.

(xxxix.) Item that butchers, slaughterers and others shall not carry out the blood of slaughtered animals in tubs, or pour it out in the streets or elsewhere during the day, but only in the morning before six o'clock, or in the evening after nine o'clock; and shall not keep any blood in tubs or elsewhere, except what may have been collected during the day, which they shall pour away either in the evening of the same day or the next morning, within the hours above appointed, as aforesaid; and what may have been collected during the night shall be poured away in the morning or evening, under a penalty of six Carolus gulden, from every man or woman neglecting to observe this regulation, to be divided as above.

(xl.) Item that no retailers of meat or tripe-women shall continue to cut up or clean any tripe, or intestines of any animals whatsoever, or throw out the refuse into the street in the Hague or elsewhere, or cause the same to be done, but shall observe the regulations laid down in the Hague on this point.

(xli.) Item that no one whatsoever, bakers, brewers or others having garden-stuff, &c., shall keep pigs in the Hague, or drive them along the streets, or leave them there, except such as are brought for sale to the weekly market, which in that case shall be driven in the shortest way; and such as have not been sold, as soon as the market is over, shall be driven away again by the same shortest way to the nearest places where they may be kept, not suffering them to rout about in the gutters, rubbish-heaps or elsewhere, under penalty of forfeiture of the animals.

(xlij.) Item that no one shall keep any ducks, geese, spoonbills, &c., or any such bird, or tame rabbits, to sell, under a penalty of forfeiting the same.

(xliij.) Item that no one whatsoever shall bring to the Hague to sell, or dispose of by auction, any little "hot plums" or small cherries, gathered some time since or recently, or any Spanish cherries, black or others, that have been gathered a long time, or are more than three days old, under a penalty of forfeiting the same (to be thrown into the water), and a fine of three Carolus gulden, to be divided as above.

(xliij.) Item that the fines above appointed shall be collected from the burghers of the Hague by the bailiff or sheriff's officers; any due from their Honours belonging to the said Court, shall be collected by the Procureur-general of the same, one third to be applied for the benefit of the officer, one third to the sick-house in the Hague, and the other third to the informer.

And any one becoming liable to any of the fines above appointed, and not having the means to pay the same, shall receive summary punishment at the discretion of the magistrate, according to the circumstances of the case.

INVENTORY OF THE GOODS OF ALEXANDER NEVILLE, ARCHBISHOP OF YORK, 1388.

ALEXANDER NEVILLE, archbishop of York, 1377-1388, was a younger brother of John, fifth Lord Neville, of Raby, and son of Ralph, fourth Lord Neville, and Alice, daughter of Hugh, Lord Audley. Destined to take holy orders he was from an early age overwhelmed with rich benefices and preferments.¹ When only in his fifteenth year the pope, at the request of David, king of Scotland, granted him a dispensation to hold a benefice.² By virtue of this he was presented to the valuable living of Aysgarth. Four years later, not yet nineteen, he received another dispensation, this time at the request of Edward III., so as to be able to hold two benefices with cure of souls, and power to exchange them.³ In 1361 he was nominated by the pope to the archdeaconry of Cornwall, in succession to Mr. Thomas David, who had died at the Roman Court. The accumulation of so many ecclesiastical benefices on one person seems to have given rise to a good deal of discontent, so that as the condition of obtaining this archdeaconry, he had to promise to resign the living of Kirkby Misperton. He was still richly beneficed, as besides the archdeaconry of Cornwall and the living of Aysgarth, he held the hospital of Bolton in the diocese of Durham.⁴ The same year, 1361, by royal command he received a prebend and canonry in York Minster, and in 1369 was appointed archdeacon of Durham.

a prebend and canonry at Wherwell (Ibid., 374). Notwithstanding this grant, made on Aug. 17th, 1361, the church of Brantingham, with the prebend and canonry of Bole, in York Minster, had already been granted at the request of John, king of France, and of the duke of Brittany, on Aug. 11th to Philip Beauchamp, son of Roger, Lord Beauchamp. If he could not have these he was to have a prebend and canonry at York. Although he was only twenty-three, he already held prebends and canonries at Lincoln and Crediton, and the chapel of Tickhill (Ibid.).

He was elected archbishop of York in succession to John Thoresby, who died Nov. 6th, 1373, and a bull having been obtained was consecrated June 4th, 1374, and enthroned at York, Dec. 18th.

The archbishop became very unpopular by the course he took in supporting Richard II. in his arbitrary method of government. He, with another Yorkshireman, Michael de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, and Robert Vere, duke of Ireland, were the most important of the king's advisers in government matters. They were accused of turning the king against his nobles, and telling him that obnoxious acts of parliament could be revoked, and that as long as the lords enjoyed so much power he was only a king in name. In consequence of this advice the king entirely deserted the lords, his natural councillors, and walked, joked, and took counsel only with the archbishop and his other unpopular friends.¹

To rid the king of his unwise advisers the lords appellant, as they were afterwards called, rose in the autumn of 1387 under the leadership of the earl of Gloucester and the king's cousin, Henry, earl of Derby, and gathered their forces together at Harringay in the north of Middlesex, for the purpose of marching on London. The king's friends were divided. Some wished to yield to the lords, whilst others, amongst whom the archbishop was most strenuous, advised that the king's household should be gathered together, and that with the help of the Londoners they should try the chances of war. The more prudent course was adopted, and the archbishop found it advisable not to await the advent of his victorious enemies. He first of all went down secretly into Yorkshire, but not feeling safe there crossed over into Flanders in November, 1387.² His flight was the signal for an outburst of savage joy, and an anonymous poet³ notes how the archbishop's ecclesiastical position, high rank, and wealth availed him nothing, but that he who had been one of the chief despoilers of the church was forced to flee away a pauper:—

Nil odor incensi tunc præfuit Eboracensi,
Sed nec mitra choris, nec opes, nec culmen honoris;
Ad regale latus cum plus sit ad alta levatus,
Corruit a sede, sic transit præsul ab æde.
Curæ mercator primas fuit et spoliator,
Pauper et abscessit, quem prævia culpa repressit.
Sic fugit hic prædo cleri nova villa Macedo,
Suem quia sic vixit, pater ecclesiæ maledixit.

At the parliament held in following spring the archbishop was appealed of treason, and not appearing was pronounced guilty. Being a churchman he escaped sentence of death, but was outlawed and all his lands and goods forfeited, and further proceedings were to be taken. An application was made to Urban VI., who in April, 1388, issued a bull translating him to St. Andrew's.¹ Urban's authority was not acknowledged by the Scots, so this translation was illusory, and had the same effect as deprivation.² Neville ended his days as a parish priest at Louvain, where he died on May 16th, 1392, and was buried in the church of the Carmelites in that city. In 1397, when Richard II. got the upper hand of his rebellious subjects, he was declared to have been loyal.

Soon after the archbishop's flight his goods were seized, and a valuation made in Lincolnshire, though why they should have been valued in that county there is nothing to show. They were ultimately sent up to London and re-valued there on Dec. 10th, 1388. There is a considerable difference between the two valuations, the country one being less than a third of the London one. Possibly the Lincolnshire valuation was too low, and this made it necessary to have the goods re-valued.

The inventory relates solely to cloths for tables and beds, with a few mantles and hats, besides some ecclesiastical articles mentioned at the end. In fact only such goods of the archbishop as would cost little for carriage were taken up to London. His mitre is not mentioned, though there is a curious story connected with it, which appears on one of the Rolls.³ About All Saints' Day, 9 Richard II. (Nov. 1st, 1385), the archbishop pledged it to William Walleworth, a citizen of London, then living in the parish of St. Michael's, Crooked Lane, better known to posterity as the lord mayor who slew Wat Tiler, for 193*li.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, with a proviso that if the mitre was not redeemed by the feast of the Purification then next (Feb. 2nd), it was to be forfeited. The mitre never was redeemed, and at the time of the archbishop's attainder the king claimed it. Margaret, Walworth's widow and executrix, who had possession of the mitre, alleged that it was not worth more than the money advanced on it. Ultimately an arrangement was come to by which she was to pay the king a further sum of 6*li.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, and retain the mitre.

³ Ex. L. T.R. Mem. Communia, Easter, 11 Ric. II., m. 19.

After reading this inventory it is very clear that Chaucer, when writing "The Dethe of Blaunche the Duchesse," just after the death in 1369 of Blanche of Lancaster, wife of John of Gaunt, had some house in view, which was furnished in a way very like that of the archbishop's:—

If he wol make me slepe a lite (little),
 Of downe of puré dowvés white
 I wil give him a fether-bed,
 Rayéd (striped) with golde, and right wel cled
 In fyn blak satyn doutremere,
 And many a pilwe, and every bere (pillowcase)
 Of cloth of Reynes, to slepé softe;
 Him thar not nede to turnen ofte.
 And I wol give al that fallés
 To a chambre; and all his hallés
 I wol do peynte with puré golde,
 And tapite (carpet) hem ful many folde
 Of oo sute. [ll. 249-261]

In this inventory it is very noticeable that all the cloths and linens came from abroad (doutremere). Cloth was imported from Paris, Dinant, Champagne, Flanders and Hainault (Henand), and from the two latter places linen (drap lienge). Paris, Dinant and Rennes (Reyns or Reynes) sent towels. This fact is noteworthy, as it shows how backward this country then was in manufacturing cloths and linen. At this period, near the end of the fourteenth century, there was no place in England of sufficient importance as a manufacturing centre to give its name to any cloth or linen mentioned in this inventory.

Curtains (courtyns) of tartaryn occur twice further on. It was certainly a costly stuff, though the material is not known. It came from the east of Tartary. In the ceremonial observed at the making of a Knight of the Bath (Hewitt's Ancient Armour, iii. 457, quoting Archæological Journal, v. 269), it is stated "Un auter (chivaler) luy vestiera ove un kyrtelle de rouge tartaryn; un auter luy donera le

ST. ANDREW, KIRK ELLA.

February, 1865.—This church having lately undergone an extensive restoration, with partial rebuilding, is now in very good condition. The plan is nave with north and south aisles, chancel and west tower, and south porch. The nave has a new clerestory and roof—the clerestory has circular foiled windows; the walls of the aisles are also new and extended so as to give more width to the aisles. All the new inserted windows being Decorated, of three lights. The porch is also new, but within it is retained an ancient doorway with semi-circular arch. The roofs both of nave and aisles are new; the arcades of the nave have each four Early English pointed arches, of which the pillars on the north are circular, on the south octagonal. The tower arch is a lofty pointed one, open to the nave, and springing at once from the wall. The seats are new, the organ is in the north aisle. The font is a new one, but said to reproduce the old one, having a plain octagonal bowl and fluted stem. The chancel retains its ancient walls and much of its original character, but some of the exterior is plastered. The chancel arch is pointed, on octagonal shafts, and across it is a wood screen having some Decorated tracery and shafts with capitals, and star-like ornament in the spandrel. The roof of the chancel is of higher pitch than that of the nave. On the south are six single lancet windows, original; and at the east a triple lancet. The south-east window has the cill. These are good Early English. The east window is filled with stained glass by Wailes. On the north are three similar original lancet windows, and a pointed doorway. The former now opens into a more modern aisle or chapel and a new vestry; the former contains the vault of the Sykes' family, and has a sumptuous modern monument by Bacon. The chancel is newly paved, the altar is of oak, with date 1619, and the reredos has polished tiles. The lancets in the chancel were till lately closed up, now opened in the recent restoration; those on the south are remarkable from being set so closely.

The tower is Perpendicular, three stages in height, and of good masonry, embattled with unfinished pinnacles, and a stair turret at the north-east, lighted by slits. There are corner buttresses, a western doorway, and window of three lights. Over the window is a canopied niche containing a statue of St. Andrew; the belfry windows of three lights, plain without tracery.

ST. HILDA, EGTON.

July, 1857.—This church has a nave with narrow south aisle, chancel, and western tower and a south porch. The exterior has a forlorn look, with some wretched modern alterations. The tower is small and poor, of modern character, and erected over the west end of the aisle. The arcade on the south side of the nave is Norman, of five plain semi-circular arches, springing from circular columns having square capitals. The doorway within the porch is semi-circular. The windows of the nave are all modern and wretched. The chancel arch is pointed on imposts. The chancel has a pointed moulded doorway on the south, and also two Decorated windows of two lights, with square heads; on the north one square-headed, of Perpendicular character. The east window is destroyed. In the east wall is a square recess, probably an aumbrye. In the chancel is a slab bearing a cross flory. The interior is out of order, has whitened pews and a west gallery. The west part of the aisle is enclosed for a vestry, and contains a large marble monument to John Burdett, Esq., 1737. The font has a carved octagonal bowl, of cup-shape diminishing downwards, and of uncertain date.

There is a large unsightly buttress added on the north side.

ST. LEONARD, CAYTON.

July, 1857.—This church is in a forlorn state and much out of repair, but though neither large nor impressive, still if it were in good condition its appearance would be very creditable; nor is it devoid of interesting architectural features.

The plan is nave and north aisle, chancel, west tower and south porch. The south doorway is Norman and good. The arch of three orders, each with excellent chevron mouldings and two orders of shafts. The nave is divided from the aisle by two very obtuse and wide arches, springing from a circular column with octagonal capital and square base, of semi-Norman character. The chancel arch is pointed, chamfered, and on octagonal capitals. The aisle does not extend to the west end of the nave. The nave is shockingly blocked up by pews and galleries—there being one of the latter at the west end, and another actually over the chancel,—but a few open benches of the Caroline period appear. The pulpit is exalted to an unusual height. The windows in the nave are all modern abominations. The roofs are all mean and of low pitch, and the walls clogged with whitewash. The chancel roof is especially out of repair, and the wet penetrates through it.

The chancel has an east window of two lights, and good Decorated character, the only good one in the church. In the east wall is a quadrangular recess. On the south of the altar a piscina, with trefoil head, but rude and reaching deep in the wall, with a stone ledge at the back. There is a small aisle or chapel on the north of the chancel, opening to it by a large arch. In it is a polygonal piscina in the angle. Eastward of this is a small building, just to the north of the altar, on which a tree grows on the outside; it has no door, and only one slit-like opening at the east end. It seems vaulted within.

There is a sepulchral arched recess in the external south wall of the chancel, and a small brass of the seventeenth century. The font is a plain circular vessel attached to a pier. The tower is small and opens to the nave by a small pointed arch, more like a door. It seems Perpendicular, has a battlement and plain pinnacles, a square two-light window on the west, and belfry windows in couplets. There are two bells. The masonry of the chancel is smooth; in the rest of the church it is coarse and rough.

The south porch has stone seats.

ST. OSWALD, FLAMBOROUGH.

July, 1857.—A church of tolerable size, the nave and chancel having each north and south aisles; but there is no tower, only a wooden belfry. It seems chiefly Perpendicular. The nave is of four bays, the chancel of three. All the arches are pointed, with octagonal pillars having capitals, and the clerestory is continued along both nave and chancel, which has square-headed windows of two lights, some mutilated. The east window of the chancel is of three lights, of the south aisle four, of the north aisle two, all pointed and Perpendicular. The other windows are square-headed, of two or three lights; some on the north are apparently Decorated, the rest Perpendicular, and some mutilated. The chancel arch has good mouldings; there is a fine wood screen and rood loft, also parclose screens on the south. At the west end of the nave there is a large walled space. The interior is much whitewashed. There is an organ. The east end of the north aisle enclosed for a vestry.

The walls are partially patched with brick in the chancel. On the south of the nave they are mainly of brick, especially the clerestory of the chancel, and a porch at the west bay of the south aisle, the doorway of which has good mouldings in brick. Some parts are whitewashed outside, and the chancel arch has a weather-beaten look. The nave clerestory is loftier than that of the chancel. At the west end is a pointed arch in the wall, showing that a tower was intended.

ST. MARY, WATTON.

July, 1857.—A small church, wholly late Perpendicular and built of brick, consisting of a wide nave and chancel, with western tower. The style is almost debased, but from certain indications about the chancel, the church seems to have been built before the Reformation. The windows of the nave are all square-headed and labelled, some of them long and some shorter, and all of two lights. The roof of the nave is coned, and panelled with ribs and bosses. The tower arch is pointed, springing at once from the wall. The nave is unusually wide. There is no chancel arch, but a screen of open panelling forms the separation. The east window is of three lights, with flat arch and no tracery or foils. The side windows single, but wide and obtuse; but there are also lychnoscopes both north and south, the former a lancet, the latter trefoiled. In some of the chancel windows is stained glass. There are also brackets south of the altar and in the east wall. The chancel is carpeted and wainscoted, with seats round it, and is very neatly kept. There are traces of colour on roof both of nave and chancel. The font is large: the bowl a circular cup with moulding round it, on a square stem. The walls entirely of brick, and without parapets. The north doorway has few mouldings. The tower very plain, without parapet, and belfry window of two lights. On the west side a three-light window. The porch on the south is decidedly debased. On the gable a cross.

Near the church are the remains of the abbey, built into a large mansion; some parts of beautiful Perpendicular brick-work, with embattled parapet and cornice under it; also a grand oriel window of two stages, with fine stone panelling. The adjoining park has fine trees.

ST. (MARGARET), BESWICK.

July, 1857.—A small mean church, with only chancel and nave, and covered with thatch, and over the west end a wooden bellcot. The east window is an Early English triplet. North of the chancel is one lancet; south of it are two quasi lancets, but which seem to be late. In the nave is one lancet on the north, and traces of some others now closed; also a square-headed two-light late window of ordinary character. At the west end of the nave is an obtuse lancet.

The interior is very mean and low, and choked up with pews; the roof ceiled. The chancel roof is tiled, and there is a cross on the gable. The font is small and ridiculous.

ST. MARY, COTTINGHAM.

July 8, 1857.—A fine church of imposing appearance, cruciform in plan, with handsome central tower, and aisles to the nave. The whole in very good condition, both without and within. The transepts are shallow, and there is no clerestory to the nave, nor aisles to the chancel.

The nave is Decorated, the remainder good early Perpendicular, and there is much about the church that reminds one of Holy Trinity, Hull, on rather a smaller scale. The nave has on each side a fine arcade of lofty arches, richly moulded, with light piers of four clustered shafts, Perpendicular, flat bands being attached to each shaft. The arches have hoods with corbel heads. The roof is open and rather plain, with tie beams. The nave is remarkably uniform. The two eastern arches have been underbuilt for the sake of strengthening them. The windows of the north and south aisles are of three lights, with flowing tracery, all alike, having externally hoods with corbels. There is a two-light window over the north door; the west window is of four lights. The buttresses at the west end of the nave have pedimental canopies with crockets and finials. The west doorway has continuous arch mouldings; as also is that outside the south porch, which has an upper stay modernised. The buttresses of the aisles are plain, the parapets of the aisles embattled, and the roof covered with lead. The whole of the exterior is very beautiful, and the stone remarkably white and fine. The view down the church within is very fine, and entirely uninterrupted.

The arches under the tower have been altered and underbuilt for the purposes of strength, and rather spoiled; the eastern window has fine mouldings, but is still underbuilt by another with concave octagonal shafts. The arches from the aisles to the transepts are also underbuilt, so there appears to have been much cause for being alarmed as to the safety of the tower. The transepts are very shallow, though lofty, and have long Perpendicular windows of five lights. The nave has new seats with poppy heads. The chancel is stalled. The organ is in the south transept. The chancel is long and grand, entirely Perpendicular. The east window, of seven lights, is subacuated, and rather wide; its central light common to both divisions. On the north and south of the chancel are four very good windows of three lights, with hoods and corbels, and embattled transoms. The heads are varied, both human and animal. The roof has been renewed. There is a vestry on the north, opening by a pretty moulded doorway and massive oak door. There are no sedilia, which is strange in so fine a church. The altar rails are of stone. In the chancel is a slab with a very fine brass¹ to Nicolas de Stuteville, Founder, representing a priest in cope, with hands joined in prayer, under a crocketed ogee canopy, with inscription partly gone:—

 obiit iij die mensis Junii anno Domini millesimo ccclxxxiiij.
 On the border runs the following legend:—

Hujus erat rector domus hic Nicolaus humatus
 Factor et erector de Luda queso beatus
 Porro vires Christi gestans dedit ecclesiarum
 Prebendas isti Beverlaci quoque Sarum
 Famelicos pavit, rixantes pacificavit
 Nudos armavit, feneratam nam geminavit
 Sed quia labe carens sub cœlo nullus habetur
 Natum virgo parens anime pete propicietur.

There is also a smaller brass to John Smyth and Johanna his wife, 1504. The chancel is embattled, but the intended pinnacles on the buttresses never were finished. The windows have externally fine mouldings and hoods. The east gable has not been quite completed; the niche in the centre of the gable is cut short. The east window of the vestry is a good semi-domestic specimen, of three lights, with good mouldings. The north doorway of the nave has good mouldings, and shafts with capitals of foliage. The transepts have pedimental buttresses as the nave. The transepts are probably Decorated in origin, and coeval with the nave, as a two-light window of that kind remains on the east side of the south transept.

The tower is highly ornamental and Perpendicular, with embattled parapets, and eight pinnacles; light corner buttresses, and buttresses between the belfry windows, of which are two on each side, very long, of three lights, with transoms. At the north-east an octagonal turret.

ST. MARY, HANDSWORTH.

April 13, 1860.—This church has been much modernised, especially on the outside. It has nave with north aisle, chancel, and west tower with spire. The north side of the nave is rebuilt in a poor style. The tower is perhaps of early character in its lower part only; the rest is wholly modern, and it is crowned by an octagonal spire set on an octagonal turret. The nave has the original Early English arcade, of three pointed arches, with pillars both circular and octagonal; the capitals octagonal, and one has rude foliage. The chancel arch has been altered. The south side of the nave is unaltered, has a battlement, and three Perpendicular three-light windows, rather mutilated. The roof is of low pitch, but not bad, with bosses. The chancel has at the east an Early English triplet; the other windows modern. There is a sacristy north of the chancel, entered by the descent of one step. The nave is much blocked up by pews, and a gallery across the chancel arch, which contains the organ. The font is modern. The chancel is much lower than the nave.

ST. HELEN, TREETON.

April 13, 1860.—An interesting church, consisting of a short nave with north and south aisles, a chancel, a tower occupying the western bay of the south aisle, and a south porch with south chapel.

There are some curious features, and some early work. The tower appears to be of plain Early English work, is without buttress, and tapers, and has a lancet window on the west side; but the belfry storey is of later work and finer masonry, having a battlement and four little pinnacles, and belfry windows of two lights, of Perpendicular character. On the south side of the tower are several small slit-like openings. This tower is small and does not fill up the width of the aisle, and presents to it much solid wall, pierced by a small acute arch, springing from octagonal corbels with heads, and some toothed moulding. The nave is short and encumbered by bad irregular pews; the south arcade is Early English, has two rather wide pointed arches, on a central pier, which is clustered and has a toothed moulding, and foliage in the capital. There is a kind of fleur-de-lys above the front shaft. The responds are octagonal, set on head corbels. The northern arcade has two semi-circular arches, with a mutilated octagonal pier, which may possibly be of late date, but is doubtful. There is a clerestory on both sides of late square-headed windows of two lights; the roof is low-pitched and plain. The south aisle seems to have had its breadth increased, and a new Perpendicular wall built, when the south chapel of the chancel was erected; the whole south side presenting now a Perpendicular wall, with battlement and square-headed windows of three lights. But to prove the south aisle of the nave to be of ancient origin, there is an Early English piscina in the south wall before the eastern addition begins; this is small and rude, having a small trefoil arch with toothed mouldings, and a round orifice. There is a hagioscope from the nave on the south into the chancel. The north aisle has a Decorated two-light window, and some square-headed of two lights of Perpendicular character; at the west end one of three lights. There are also stone brackets on the north wall.

The chancel arch is very small, and set in the midst of much wall; it is genuine Early English and early, pointed on square abaci, falling into short wedge-like shafts. Above this arch, facing west, are three stone brackets, and on the north is a hagioscope through the wall, as also on the south. The chancel is large in proportion to the nave, and is of good Decorated work. The east window is of three lights, and reticulated Decorated tracery; the mullions being moulded both within and without. On the north side is a window, transitional from Early English to Decorated, having two trefoil-headed lights, surmounted by a moulded hood on head corbels, both within and without. The altar is approached by a high flight of steps. On the south are three Decorated sedilia, with trace of arcading having been carried further west, but intercepted by the erection of the south chapel. The sedilia ascend eastward, have good mouldings and trefoiled heads; the hood mouldings on varied corbel heads, amongst which may be seen a king and queen. There is also a piscina, small and trefoiled, and above are two windows—one resembling the opposite window on the north; the eastern one altered to Perpendicular, and containing some remains of fine stained glass. On the north of the altar are two aumbries. The south chapel, added in Perpendicular period, opens to the chancel by a pointed arch on octagonal brackets; within it is a piece of late wood screen work. This chapel has a rude piscina, and is full of monumental slabs of the seventeenth century. It is divided from the aisle of the nave by a plain flat pointed arch. There are some ancient sepulchral effigies half hidden by pews. The south porch is plain; its doorway has a segmental arch. The south aisle and east end of the chancel are enriched by crocketed pinnacles, and the clerestory is embattled. The font has an octagonal bowl, diminishing downwards to the stem.

ALL SAINTS', ASTON.

April 13, 1860.—This church has a clerestoried nave with north and south aisles, chancel, western tower, and south porch. The chancel has a new roof and some new Decorated windows of two lights, north and south, one Flamboyant in character, and at the east of three lights. The nave has a Norman arcade on the north, with semi-circular arches and large octagonal columns. On the south are two similar arches, and one of segmental form. The clerestory windows are square-headed, Perpendicular, and of two lights. The chancel arch is a wide pointed one, on octagonal columns. There is a rood screen. The nave has a flat ceiling. The windows of the south aisle are square-headed and mutilated. The east window of the same aisle is also mutilated, and has animal figures at the extremities of the hood. There are some curious gargoyles; one represents a devil carrying off a woman. In the north aisle the windows are square-headed, of two lights.

In the chancel is an incised slab, with the figure of a knight; also one to Domine Alice Melton, AD., M.CC In the north aisle a brass plate inscribed:—"Of yo^r charite pray for the soule of Sir John Melton, Knight, which decessed the xi. daye of July, in the yere of o^r lord M^oV^cX^o, and in the second yere of the reigne of Kyng Henry the eight, on whos soule JHU' have mercy.—Amen."¹ The Meltons are now represented through the Darcys by the Duke of Leeds. In the chancel is a very large mural monument to Lord Darcy and his three wives, whose figures are all kneeling in niches, and his effigy above. The wives died in 1606, 1622, and 1624, at the ages of 28, 60 and 19. Opposite is the monument of Elizabeth, the fourth wife, re-married to Sir F. Fane. He died in 1680. She in 1669.

The font is a very fine one, of Perpendicular character; the bowl octagonal, has a battlement along the top, and is panelled with quatrefoils and wavy wheels. At the base is the figure of a king sitting with spear in his hand, and on the opposite corner an angel; said to be Herod lying in wait for our Saviour, and an angel watching.

There is a west gallery and a barrel organ. The south porch is of a sort of Flamboyant style, has queer animal figures in a moulding in the upper part, and a two-light window. There is a delicate canopied niche, and an angel beneath it. The outer doorway has a hood with head corbels, representing Edward III. and Queen Philippa.

The tower is Perpendicular, embattled, with eight crocketed pinnacles, has a west window of three lights, and belfry windows also of three lights. The battlements pierced and canopied.

SS. PETER AND PAUL, TODWICK.

April 13, 1860.—A small church, with only chancel and nave, west tower, and south porch. The chancel has Decorated windows, north and south, of two lights; at the east one of three lights, with plain intersecting monials (mullions), of questionable character. The chancel arch is low and obtuse, perhaps modern. The chancel is higher than the nave, and has the roof covered with stone tiles. The windows of the nave are vile modern ones, and this part has a mean appearance. There is an ogee sepulchral arch in the north wall. The porch is plain; the south door obtuse, and has old ironwork. The tower is a tolerable Perpendicular one, embattled, with eight crocketed pinnacles, and has a kind of saddle roof. It is not lofty; has corner buttresses, two strings (courses), belfry windows of two lights, west window of three, and no door.

The churchyard is unusually large for so small a parish.

ST. THOMAS, BROMPTON-BY-NORTHALLERTON.

April 18, 1864.—This church has a nave with north aisle, chancel, and tower on the south of the nave, forming a porch. The arcade from the nave to the aisle has four semi-Norman circular arches, with edged mouldings, on pillars alternately circular and octagonal. The windows have mostly been modernised, and there are galleries obstructing the nave on north, west, and east; the latter forming a barrier to the chancel. In the western gallery is an organ. There is no chancel arch. The chancel has on the south a trefoil-headed lancet set low, a priest's door, and a square-headed two-light Perpendicular window. The east window is Perpendicular, of three lights. Over the east gable is a cross. The font is a circular bowl. The south side of the nave has a parapet. The chancel is leaded. The tower is plain Perpendicular, has corner buttresses to the lower part, battlement and four pinnacles, belfry windows of two lights, square-headed; one stringcourse, a small projecting staircase on the east, lighted by slits, and an obtuse-headed doorway.

Brompton Church needs much improvement.

ST. OSWALD, EAST HARSLEY.¹

April 18, 1864.—This small church has only nave and chancel, with south porch; and over the west end a small bellcot for two bells. The walls have been partially rebuilt, and have some modern windows, but are finely mantled with ivy. The chancel arch is plain, apparently debased, and within it is a late wood screen. The east window is Perpendicular, of three lights, simply trefoiled, without tracery; and there are Perpendicular windows north and south of the chancel. A modern vestry has been added on the north of the chancel. The font is small, of circular form, and has a high wooden cover of Gothic character. The churchyard is uncommonly large.

ST. MICHAEL, WRAGBY.

Jan. 17, 1860.—A neat church, wholly Perpendicular, and on a very uniform plan, consisting of nave with north and south aisles, chancel with north and south aisles, west tower, and south porch. The nave has a clerestory, and on each side an arcade of four pointed arches, on octagonal columns, with moulded caps. The responds are octagonal wedge-like corbels. The clerestory windows are square-headed, of three lights, and labelled. The windows are of three lights, having two varieties.

The chancel arch is pointed, on octagonal shafts. The chancel has three arches, similar to those of the nave, on the north, and two on the south. The south aisle is not carried to the east end, but there is a vestry at its east end. There is an arch on grotesque corbel between the north aisle of the nave and that of the chancel. The chancel has a panelled roof; in the nave it is flat. The font in use is modern; of the ancient one there remains a cylindrical bowl on a stem. The chancel has no clerestory. The interior has rather a pleasing appearance, having been put into a neat and rather smart condition some years ago, but not quite up to the mark of the present day. It is paved with some uniformity, but the chancel left open, and there is much fine woodcarving, mostly of Dutch character, and not Gothic, especially in the pulpit. The reredos seems more recent. The windows abound in stained glass, evidently not original, some of late but fair continental character, and some very poor. There is no gallery.

The porch has its inner doorway, with stilted arch, and old woodcarving on the door. The exterior very uniform. The tower is without buttress, embattled, with four small crocketed pinnacles; on the west side a door and three-light window; the belfry windows of two lights. The nave and chancel and aisles are all embattled, and there are buttresses between the windows. The churchyard adjoins the park of Nostel Priory, and is surrounded by beautiful evergreens.

ST. HELEN, HEMSWORTH.

Jan. 17, 1860.—A poor church, having nave and chancel, each with north and south aisles, south porch, and small western tower. The outer walls have been much modernised. The nave has a clerestory, and each arcade is of three pointed arches on octagonal columns, just like those at Wragby, and of course Perpendicular. The clerestory windows square-headed, of two lights, and mauled. The ceiling modern, as are most of the windows of the nave. The chancel arch resembles those of the nave arcade. The chancel has on each side one pointed arch, opening to the aisle, on octagonal shafts, and a second on the north forming a door to vestry. The east window is Decorated, of five lights, with flowing tracery; and on the south is a trefoil piscina. The south aisle has square-headed windows on the south, and a three-light Decorated one at the east; also a trefoil piscina with stone ledge. There are pointed arches between the aisles of the nave and those of the chancel. The font is modern. There are pews and west gallery, and a finger organ. The tower arch is very small, and the tower has an insignificant appearance; it has moulded parapet, and no string nor buttress. On the west side a narrow two-light window, and belfry windows also of two lights. The porch is more interesting, entirely of stone, the roof arched with strong ribs, and covered with flags. The outer doorway has obtuse arch on corbels. The south chancel arch is flagged.

ALL SAINTS', SOUTH KIRBY.

Jan. 17, 1860.—This church has nave and chancel, each with north and south aisles, west tower, and north and south porches. The corbels to the hood mouldings of the windows are remarkably fine. The principal features are Perpendicular, especially externally; the masonry is good. The south chancel aisle embattled. The nave has crocketed pinnacles on the south, set on buttresses, and there are gargoyles set upon shafts which stand on the set-offs of the buttresses of the east end; there being between these shafts and the buttress a small pierced arch. The chancel is tiled. The nave leaded. The south porch is fine, with moulded parapet, two pinnacles, a cross on the gable, and gargoyles. Over the doorway a niche and some armorial shields. The tower very fine and lofty, has battlement and eight crocketed pinnacles, corner buttresses canopied in stages, and three stringcourses. The west window of three lights. The west doorway has ogee arch with finial, and fine mouldings, in which is an anomalous ornament resembling the toothed. The north porch is wholly of stone, with strong ribs, but is shallow and small; its doorway has little shafts.

The nave is separated from each aisle by two large wide pointed arches, on circular columns with octagonal caps. The roof in nave and aisles is panelled with ribs and bosses. The north aisle is wider than the other. The northern windows have been deprived of tracery. The southern have three lights, and are good Perpendicular. There is additional panelling in the roof over the rood-loft place. The aisles of the chancel open to those of the nave by irregular pointed arches; that of the north is low and has a window over it. The chancel arch is pointed, on octagonal shafts. The chancel roof is open and original. The east window is mutilated. The chancel opens to the south chapel by two lofty pointed arches, on octagonal pier with capital; to the north chapel by two low straight-sided arches, on short octagonal pillar. The north chapel is low, and has monuments to the Wentworths; its windows square-headed, of three lights, the eastern pointed, and all Perpendicular. The tower arch is lofty, on octagonal corbels, sculptured with pretty and varied foliage. There are six bells, a modern font, and the interior has ugly pews and gallery. The priest's door has foliage in its eastern jamb moulding.

ALL SAINTS', HOOTON PAGNELL.

Jan. 17, 1860.—This church has a nave with north aisle, chancel, south porch, and west tower. The tower in its lower portion is Norman, and opens to the nave by an arch of that character. It has corner buttresses, and the upper part is Perpendicular; has west window of three lights, battlements, and four crocketed pinnacles, and belfry windows of two lights. The south wall of the nave appears to be early Norman, and is of coarse rubble work. The south doorway is plain Norman; the doorcase square-headed, and the tympanum of the arch filled with stone. The porch is plain and flagged. There are traces of Early English windows in the south wall, but others are modern insertions. The north aisle is continued along the chancel, but terminates in a vestry. Its roof is flagged. Its windows mostly late, square-headed, labelled, and of three lights without foils. The nave is divided from the aisle by two Early English pointed arches, on circular column with square capital and rude foliage; the east respond an octagonal shaft. The chancel has on the north a small plain Norman arch in the midst of much wall, dividing the north chapel, and this chapel opens to the north aisle by a pointed arch. The east window of the chancel is wretched. There is a clerestory on the north of the nave, but no windows in it.

ST. MICHAEL, BRODSWORTH.

Jan. 17, 1860.—A small church, having nave with north aisle, chancel, and low western tower. The tower is low and heavy, in its lower portion Norman, having a buttress on the south side, with the Norman pellet ornament. There is a lancet on the south, and slit over it. Belfry windows Early English, of two lights, within one pointed arch. The tower arch opening to the nave is low and plain Norman, upon impost. The aisle is very narrow, and has near the west a small Norman window. The nave is divided from the aisle by two Early English arches, pointed, upon octagonal columns which have capitals of early character, with a kind of scoloped ornament; the responds are circular, with square capitals. The chancel arch is pointed, on plain octagonal shafts. There is some walling to the west of the arcade dividing off that part of the aisle. The nave is disfigured and encumbered by pews and galleries. The windows north and south of the nave are of three lights, without foliation, and doubtful period, except one late square-headed one. There is a small pointed arch between the aisle of the nave and that of the chancel; the latter is much wider than that of the nave, and opens to the chancel by a very wide pointed arch upon octagonal shafts. The chancel is much modernised and ceiled; there is a vestry on the north with the flattened trefoil-headed door. The exterior of the church is covered with ugly yellow stucco. The font has an octagonal bowl, on an octagonal stem.

ALL SAINTS', CATTON.

Nov. 21, 1860.—This church has a nave with north and south aisles, and with north transeptal chapel, chancel, and tower engaged at the west end of the south aisle. The south aisle is wider than the northern. The northern arcade has three Early English pointed arches, and a fourth opening to the transept is Norman, semi-circular, and lower than the others. The first pier from the west is cylindrical, the two next of clustered shafts. The Norman arch has its eastern respond and shaft of Early English character, with square and bosses, and early foliage in the capital; the shaft set on a corbel. The south arcade has three pointed arches, on octagonal pillars; and the tower occupying its west end opens to the nave by a pointed arch on corbels. The tower itself is clearly a Perpendicular addition and is of rather small size, and its east wall opens to the aisle by an arched doorway. It is of two stages, embattled, with four pinnacles, has corner buttresses, the belfry windows of two lights, on the west side a single window with ogee head and labelled; there are gargoyles, and the masonry of the tower is good. Between the transept and the aisle is a pointed arch from the pier across to a corbel, consisting of a crowned head. The transept has on its west side a small window, which looks Norman. It has also a square-headed Perpendicular window of three lights on the east side, and one modern one. One of two lights, early Decorated, in the north aisle, and also a square-headed Perpendicular one. The south aisle has Perpendicular windows, both square and pointed. The nave has a modern ceiling. The corbels of the aisle roof remain. There is a piscina in the east wall, and brackets on each side of the east window. There is a brick porch, within which is an Early English doorway.

The chancel arch is pointed, springing straight from the wall; the base of the rood-screen remains. The chancel has been frightfully spoiled and modernised; has a flat ceiling, and much of the walls reconstructed in brick, with very mean windows. It has, however, the original south doorway, with graduated hood, and over it a niche with similar hood. The chancel is dreary within, and the pulpit so placed in it as to block up the altar. The font is Early English, the bowl a circular bowl, upon a stem. There is a brass, A.D. 1591. There is a doorway in the north aisle, with its cill or threshold very high up, so as to look doubtful whether it was originally a doorway.

ALL HALLOW'S, KIRBY HILL.¹

Nov. 21, 1860.—A small mean church, having nave and chancel, with north aisle along both, small western tower, and south porch. The aisle is divided from the nave by a rude early Norman arcade, the arches plain and without mouldings, the piers are circular columns, to which are attached octagonal shafts. The chancel arch is a rude pointed one, springing straight from the walls. The chancel has on the north a fine Early English arch opening to the aisle, on clustered columns with moulded capitals, and to the eastward in the wall a flat trefoil-headed opening, constituting a large hagioscope from the aisle to the altar. The east window is Perpendicular, of three lights; the other windows are mostly square-headed and Perpendicular. There are some plain old open benches with poppy heads. The font has a cylindrical bowl on a round stem. The tower is modern. The chancel has a moulded parapet. The nave a plain lead roof.

ST. ANDREW, ALDBOROUGH.

Nov. 21, 1860.—This church has a nave, with north and south aisles and clerestory, chancel, and west tower; the whole very regular and uniform in plan, some portions Decorated, and some Perpendicular. The roof is low pitched in the nave, and without parapets, and leaded; rather higher in the chancel. The aisles have Decorated windows of two lights, and of three at the east. The arcades of the nave have each four pointed stilted arches, on octagonal columns with capitals, the hood mouldings rising from large head corbels. The clerestory windows square-headed, of two lights, and Perpendicular. There are some portions of ancient stained glass, and some modern. In the south aisle, near the east end, is a square almary, also a carved pue with date 1699. The roof of the nave is flat and panelled; that of the chancel is coved. The chancel arch is lofty, on octagonal shafts. The chancel very long and wholly Perpendicular, having an east window of five lights, and on north and south sides windows of two lights. North of the chancel is a vestry opening by a pointed arched doorway, with hood on corbel heads. There are two piscinæ, one with rose orifice. The sacrarium neat, with Caroline wood wainscoting, and chairs of the same date. On the altar two dishes.

In the north aisle is a sepulchral slab, with the matrix of a brass in form of a cross, with two sets of arms. Also set up against the wall is a large brass representing a knight in enriched armour covered with crosses, bearing shield charged with—a fess between three cross crosslets. At his feet inscribed "Wills. de Aldeburgh."

The font is new and too small. The interior is remarkably neat and well cared for, but is puer. There is also a west gallery, with an organ. There are no porches, but doors north and south of the nave. The tower arch is pointed and plain, springing at once from the walls. The tower contains six bells, is Perpendicular, rather low and embattled, with corner buttresses and no dividing strings, belfry windows square-headed, of two lights. On the west side is a three-light window, but no door. There are no windows at the west ends of the aisles.

The chancel has a south doorway, labelled, with panelled spandrels. On the east wall of the vestry externally is some sculpture of a mutilated figure, with a cross crosslet.

ST. MICHAEL, COPGROVE.

Nov. 21, 1860.—A small and rather mean church; consists of chancel and nave without aisles, and a wooden bellcot over the west end. The nave seems to have been wholly rebuilt, with poor windows; but there appears in the north wall externally, part of an arch with toothed moulding. The chancel arch is of Norman origin, semi-circular and plain, upon imposts, in which appears an early chevron ornamental moulding. The east window is Perpendicular, of three trefoiled lights. On the south is a two-light window, also Perpendicular. The chancel is wainscoted, and the church generally puer. The font is a circular jar on a square plinth, having the tongue-like figures at the angles.

ALL SAINTS', LAUGHTON-(EN)-LE-MORTHEN.

Sept. 20, 1860.—An interesting church, and remarkable for its lofty and beautiful spire, so situated as to be a very conspicuous object for many miles around. The plan comprises nave with north and south aisles (the aisles passing to the west wall of the tower), chancel, south porch, and western tower with spire. On the north side appears near the west some supposed Saxon work. There is a singular doorway, consisting of three arches one within the other; the lower forming the door rather flat, the others semi-circular, upon rude imposts, and coarsely put together. There are Norman portions about the chancel, but the rest of the church is of later character. The windows of the aisles are chiefly Perpendicular, square-headed, of three lights, and labelled; the corbels being finely sculptured. The parapets are moulded. The chancel is equal in height to the clerestory, of which it is a direct continuation. The interior is lofty and fine. The arcades of the nave are dissimilar. The tower, as has been said, is engaged in the aisles, and presents a vast amount of strong solid wall, but pierced by pointed arches both towards the aisles and the nave, and there is a fine stone groined roof in the tower. The south arcade beyond the tower has three tall pointed arches, on octagonal columns. The north arcade has four pointed arches, with circular columns almost Norman in character, having square abaci, and with flowered capitals resembling those at Worksop. The arches on the north are probably Perpendicular, but set on earlier piers. One bay of this arcade is within the chancel, along which the aisle is partly continued without interruption. The east respond has clustered shafts with Early English capitals. The roofs are plain. The clerestory has no windows, and there is no chancel arch. The chancel has a plain Norman window on the north, eastward of the aisle, on which side is a vestry. There is a round arched sedile south of the altar, and a piscina having a straight-sided arch, of early appearance. There is another odd recess in the south wall of the chancel, in shape of a spherical triangle. The chancel is stalled. The east window Perpendicular, of five lights, contains some stained glass; the other windows also Perpendicular, of three lights, and having some curious corbels to their hood-mouldings. There is an organ, and a low stone screen between the nave and chancel, continued along the north side so as to occupy the arch opening to the aisle; it has panelling and an embattled cornice.

The south porch has its interior doorway with ogee head, and crocketed. The steeple is a magnificent composition, of the most beautiful stone masonry. The tower has corner buttresses and battlements, a Perpendicular west window, and double belfry windows, each of two lights. The angles of the tower are chamfered, and against them set four turrets ending in rich crocketed pinnacles, with flying buttresses to the spire, as at West Retford. The spire octagonal and very lofty. The steeple is wholly Perpendicular.

The font is a fine Perpendicular one, the bowl octagonal, embattled at top, and panelled with varied ornaments--quatrefoils, wavy circles, flowers, &c.

WRESSLE CASTLE AND BUBWITH CHURCH.

By JOHN BILSON.

IN the programme of the first of our Society's excursions of this year (July 6th, 1899), a statement was made as to the date of the surviving buildings at Wressle, for which I believe I am ultimately responsible, but which, as I said at the meeting itself, I have found to be erroneous. The programme states (page 8) that "the castle was commenced in the latter part of the fourteenth century by Thomas Percy," and that "the towers at the east and west ends of the surviving south range were added about a century later." When I made the plan, which I exhibited at the meeting, I found that it was quite clear that the whole of the buildings were of one date, about 1380-90, although many alterations were made in later times. It is certain that the house as built by Thomas Percy consisted of buildings arranged around all four sides of a quadrangular court, which measured about 90 feet from north to south by 85 feet from east to west, and that there was, as Leland states, a tower at each of the four angles, and also a gateway tower which doubtless stood in the centre of the east front. The plan may be compared with those of three important quadrangular houses which were erected about the same time: Sheriff Hutton, built by John lord Nevill, when Raby was on the point of completion (the licence to crenelate Sheriff Hutton is dated 1381); Bolton, in Wensleydale, built by Richard lord Scrope in 1379; and Lumley, in Durham, built by Ralph lord Lumley in 1392. The family connections of the builders of these houses are of interest, in view of the general similarity of their plans.

A point with regard to the history of Bubwith Church¹ is worth recording. The Rev. W. O. F. Campbell, who was vicar of Bubwith when the church was recently restored, and was present at our meeting, informed us that the foundation of part of the original west wall of the nave was found immediately west of the westernmost pier. This shows that the tower which Bishop Nicholas Bubwith began, and for the completion of which he bequeathed funds in his will (1424), was erected altogether clear of the west end of the twelfth century nave, and that when this west end was taken down, the tower and nave were joined up by adding a bay to the nave arcades, while the respond piers of the original arcades (end of twelfth century) were removed to their present position. Mr. Campbell also told us that the stones now set in the pavement of the south aisle of the nave, near the westernmost pier, were removed here from another part of the nave.

A LETTER OF GENERAL LAMBERT, 1643.

THE original of the letter printed below was found some years ago, in an old stocking, with several inventories of furniture, beds, bedding, etc., in the roof of the hall at Yafforth, near Northallerton, now the property of Major Trafford. It has been copied from a photograph furnished by the Rev. J. C. Fowler, vicar of Whorlton-in-Cleveland, to whose kindness the members of the Society are indebted for its appearance in the Journal. Mr. S. R. Gardiner, the historian of the Civil Wars, in reply to a letter on the subject, says, "There is no doubt your letter should be dated 1643, as is shown by the reference to the relief of Hull and the expected aid from the Scots."

Mr. Rymer, to whom the letter is addressed, was probably Ralph Rymer, one of the sequestrators under the Commonwealth, whose name frequently occurs in the Yorkshire Royalist Composition Papers.

Good Mr Rymer, though my acquaintance wth yow bee but small, y^e^{tt} your assured good affection encourageth mee to make this addresse vnto yow, to desire yow to informe mee of your proceedinges, wher yow are, & what assistance wee may expect from o^r bretheren of Scotlande; whose helpe wee haue longe expected & much desired, beeing thitherto & still much oppressed by y^e ouerflowinge numbers of y^e God's, yours, & our enymys. The Condi' on y^t wee are in crys out for your assistance

(though y^t bee much better now, then itt was when I saw yow last), for in y^e South, att Hull, in Lincolneshire, & now in Cheshire & Wailles, (wher S^r W^m Bruerton of late hath beyond expectac'on prospered), hath God exceedingly blessed vs. But for all this y^e North from Gainsbrough to Barwicke lyeth vnder y^e power of [y^e] Ennimy who now violen[t]ly forces men by y^e Commi'on of Arrey, & no doubt butt will before longe rayse as powerfull an Army as ever before, My Lorde Gen: Fairfax not beeinge able, nor y^e Southeren Assosiation, by reason of y^er want of foot willinge, closly to pursue y^e advantage offered by or late victores, though certainly y^e distraction of y^e Ennimy was great, & offered a very fair opportunitie, especialy yf y^e Scotts had appeared in y^e North, though it had but beene only for diversion. I am now in my owne Contry raysinge whatt forces I can; & vpon y^e entrance of y^e Scotts into En[g]lande, (I doe beleve), it would bee very seasonable for yow to thinke of yours. I hope before this they haue by sad experience learnede to detest y^e Cavileer & his actions & therfor better prepared for your comminge. I doe not speake this of my knowledge but by experience of other places y^t haue dearly bought y^t with. S^r y^e occasions of this Messenger into your parts was to deliver this vnto yow & to desire yow to retorne whatt yow knowe concerninge thesse thinges, & yow conceaue fit to bee communicated vnto mee, either by writinge, or by worde of mouth by this messenger whom yow may trust. I shall much desire to heare from yow, & in y^e meane tyme rest

Your faithfull servant

ENCLOSURE OF OPEN FIELDS.

ONE of the greatest revolutions in the social life of rural England occurred when the Open Fields with their intermixed ownerships were abolished, and the owners received instead of their slips scattered throughout the Common Field an equivalent lying in one place. Like most important social movements the change was very gradual and extended over a long period of time. The exchange which had to be effected between the different owners seems to have been carried out by means of an agreement between the lord of the manor and the freeholders and tenants. Records of this kind are very scarce, so that it is generally impossible to say when this important change took place in any particular district. Mr. Frederic Seebohm in his very interesting and instructive work on this subject, "The English Village Communities," shows that in the south of England the old system lingered on till after 1800. In the north, which in its social habits and customs is less conservative than the south, it was abolished much earlier. From the document abstracted below it appears that in the manor or lordship of Hutton Rudby, near Yarm, this change had taken place shortly before 1652. In the neighbouring village of Ingleby Arncliffe the partition of the scattered strips of land was made in 1595. In the preamble to the agreement for this partition, the following reason is given for making the change:—"That whereas the seuerall grounds do ly in the said township (of Inglebee Arnecliffe) dispersed, that they shall be laid together, viz. the chefe lord's land and euery freholders' land by themselves, that is to say, the tillage by itself, meadow by itself, and pasture by itself." Notice should be taken that although the deed was executed during the Protectorate, the date is according to the computation of the Church of England.

The original is in the possession of W. Grey Robinson, Esq., Quedgley Manor, Gloucester, by whose permission it is now printed.

May 29th, in the year of Lord God according to the computation of the Church of England, 1652. Grant by William Chipchase, of Norton, co. Durham, yeoman, to Robert Chipchase, his son, of a messuage and four oxgangs of land in Hutton, near Rudby, "which said four oxgangs of land are now devided and laid out by the late partition of the manor or lordship of Hutton, together with four other oxgangs on the west part of one field, called the Midle field, adjoyning on Yarme Street on the east, and on one pasture called the Out Leyes on the west, and contains 113 acres," two of which oxgangs he purchased of one Robert Armstrong, gent., and the other two oxgangs of one William Gibson, yeoman, and Grace his wife.
